AMERICAN CONSERVATION CORPS BILL

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing, with cosponsors, legislation to establish an American Conservation Corps [ACC] to provide conservation jobs and training for our Nation's youth. An identical bill is being introduced in the Senate today by Senator MOYNIHAN.

This would be essentially the same as H.R. 999, which passed both the House and the Senate during the 98th Congress, with strong bipartisan support, but which was pocket vetoed by the President.

The President was badly advised on this matter and, judging from the calls and letters we continue to receive daily, the proposed ACC program is one that has strong public support. It would fill an unemployment gap that the private sector is still unable to close, and it would do so by using tested, cost-effective means to provide jobs and training at work that desperately needs to be done for our Nation's public lands and community resources.

The bill being introduced today contains a few modifications to meet certain of the objections of the administration, while retaining the essential elements of the original legislation. Basically these modifications include provisions for a cap on administrative expenses; uniform authorization of $75 million for each of 3 years (rather than a rising authorization each year) but no increase in the total $225 million funding authorization; and provisions to encourage increased State and local funding and participation, by increasing the share of the State and local funding from 35 percent to 50 percent, the remainder to be shared by Federal agencies and Indian tribes.

SUMMARY OF ACC BILL

The American Conservation Corps Act which is being introduced today would, like H.R. 999 in the 98th Congress, establish a youth conservation work program modeled after the Civilian Conservation Corps of the 1930's. Called the "American Conservation Corps" [ACC], the program would have both year-round (ages 16-25) and summer (ages 15-21) components.

While open to all eligible youths, special efforts would be made to enroll and recruit youth who are economically disadvantaged, as defined in the Job Training Partnership Act.

Regulations for the program would be developed by the Secretaries of Interior and Agriculture, in consultation with the Secretary of Labor and with public participation.

Corps projects could include conservation of forests, fish, wildlife, rangelands, and soils; revitalization of urban areas and preservation of historic and cultural sites; development and maintenance of recreational areas, roads, and trails, erosion and pest control; energy conservation and production of renewable energy; and emergency rehabilitation services and other functions.

The bill would also provide for educational and training opportunities and for evaluating and reporting on the programs.

Funding would be $75 million in fiscal 1985; $75 million in fiscal 1986; and $75 million in fiscal 1987. The funding would be shared by States and local governments, the Departments of Agriculture, and Interior, Indian tribes, and other Federal agencies for, example TVA and the Corps of Engineers.

YOUTH NEED HELP

In short, the ACC bill would be a relatively modest program to provide over 85,000 youth with conservation-related jobs. Additional youth would be served as funds are leveraged at the State and local levels. Indeed, there are presently 27 State and local corps similar to the ACC, and several others which are simply waiting for the boost of Federal support to get underway.

For our youth, the American Conservation Corps would be the only direct Federal program that would combine both paid employment and an opportunity for education and on-the-job training. It addresses the serious and chronic problem of youth unemployment, a problem that cannot be solved by the private sector alone.

The facts speak for themselves. According to Bureau of Labor Statistics data analyzed by the Roosevelt centennial youth project, over 38 percent of the 8.1 million Americans unemployed in November of last year were under the age of 25. Teenagers alone represent nearly 17 percent of the unemployed. Although nearly 6.8 million jobs were created since November 1982, teenagers suffered a net job loss of nearly 50,000. Nearly 230,000 of the 20- to 24-year-olds who are currently looking for work have never worked before.

On the average, during 1983, some 1.55 million teenagers classified as outside of the labor force expressed a desire to be employed on a part-time or full-time basis. The ones who have the most difficulty finding jobs are black and Hispanic teenagers, particularly young women. The unemployment rate of black teenagers remains at a staggering 40.8 percent. Meanwhile, smaller employers, who create the vast majority of the jobs in the private sector, are the least able to pay for the training of new workers.

WORK NEEDS TO BE DONE

Of course, the American Conservation Corps would not solve all of the problems of youth unemployment, nor is it meant to. It would also be a conservation program to help with the vast backlog of work that needs to be done in our national parks and other public lands and communities throughout the Nation. It would provide a highly cost-effective supplementary work force for labor-intensive projects on public lands, under the direction of professional land managers.

This is, for the most part, work that would not otherwise be accomplished. Certainly it is well known that our Nation's present responses to under-productive and eroding soil and rangeland, timberland in need of replanting, deteriorating wildlife habitat, and overused parklands, are hardly adequate.

Furthermore, comparable programs—whether at the Federal, State, or local levels—have already proven themselves to be both productive and cost effective in accomplishing needed work. Indeed, the national average for a program like the ACC has been the equivalent of $1.20 in value for each dollar spent; many specific projects have produced even higher returns. These figures do not, of course, take into account the training benefits received by the young workers nor reductions in the other public costs that inevitably flow from high youth unemployment.

In summary I would simply quote from an editorial supporting enactment of the American Conservation Corps legislation last year which was written by Malcolm S. Forbes of Forbes magazine. Mr. Forbes said:

For most of the unemployed, jobs in the private sector are the only real answer. But that is largely no answer for the vast percentage of the young unemployed . . . There is a potential answer, though, for those suffering this unyielding, embittering frustration . . .

The economy's recovery isn't going to meet the youth employment need that plagues virtually all our cities. With a renewed Civilian Conservation Corps we can make a real beginning in tackling the problem. And with the work that corps (workers) could accomplish, they would richly enhance our . . . heritage.●

A PAY AS YOU GO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, another bill which I would like to introduce today as I have in every Congress since first coming to the 89th Congress is an amendment to the Constitution providing that appropriations shall not exceed revenues in any year, except in time of war or national emergency as declared by Congress.

My proposed amendment is direct and simple. It provides that the President would determine and proclaim the estimated total revenues of the U.S. Government each year. Congress would be prohibited from authorizing the withdrawal of Treasury funds in excess of the total amount of revenues. Outlays for whatever purpose could not be greater than income.

Enactment of this amendment would give the American people an opportunity, acting through their State legislatures, to make their own decision about whether we will have a pay as you go Federal Government.

The time for positive action is ripe—and action must be taken now.

Thank you.●

PROGRESS AGAINST CANCER

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, December 12, 1984, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

PROGRESS AGAINST CANCER

Cancer strikes one of every four Americans. It is the nation's number two killer, exceeded only by heart disease. This year, 870,000 new cases of cancer and 450,000 cancer-related deaths will account for 10% of the total cost of illness in America. Of course, no price can be placed on the suffering and anguish of the victims themselves and their families. There can be no doubt that cancer is one of the most dreaded scourges of modern life.

Is the federal government's effort against cancer really working? Two thirds of the $2 billion spent annually in the fight against cancer comes out of federal tax revenue, but opinions vary as to the actual results that the effort has produced.

Congress declared war on cancer in 1971. It set up the National Cancer Program under a greatly expanded National Cancer Institute. The hope was that more money could produce a cure within five years. It is clear that the rate of cure (the percentage of individuals surviving five years after cancer is diagnosed) is better today than it was in previous decades. At the turn of the century, for example, it was very low. When cancer surgery began in the 1920's, it rose to 25%. With the advent of antibiotics in the 1940's and radiation and chemotherapy in the 1960's, it climbed again to 38%. About 49% of all cancer is considered curable now, up from 40% in 1972 when the National Cancer Program began. Still, experts say that these figures are misleading because they reflect changes in the way that cancer is detected and defined more than any real gains in the ability to cure cancer. The consensus seems to be that there has been major progress against less common forms of cancer—including thyroid cancer, Hodgkin's disease, and many childhood cancers and leukemias—but less progress against more common cancers of the lung and gastrointestinal tract. The overall cancer death rate has not declined significantly because advances in treating some forms of cancer have been offset by increases in deaths due to other forms.

Twelve years and $10.6 billion later, there is no final cure for cancer and very little public peace of mind. What does exist is a renewed sense of optimism among researchers in the field that rapid progress is in the offing. Similar claims made several years ago led to disappointment, but this time the claims are based upon better knowledge. Most important are new theories about the disease. The seeds of cancer are thought to lie in the human genetic code itself. For example, it is possible that wild cell growth, the hallmark of cancer, is caused by "oncogenes" which are present in every human being. These genes, inactive in most people, may be activated in some individuals by chemicals, radiation, or viruses. The consequence may be cells multiplying out of control. Such theories and the powerful tools of molecular biology developed during the 1970s eventually may yield a genetic vaccination that makes or keeps cancer-causing genes inactive. The distant goal is to replace the brute-force tactics of surgery, radiation, and chemotherapy with just such a treatment.

Other avenues of research are equally exciting. In one new technique, scientists saturate cancer cells with light-sensitive drugs and then kill them with high-intensity laser beams. Also, scientists are continuing to study antibodies which are very effective at detecting small amounts of cancer and in the future may be used to carry cancer-killing drugs to the site of the malignancy. The interesting research projects are too extensive to list in detail, and Congress recently provided a larger budget to extend the studies further. It is no exaggeration to say that we are in a "golden age" of cancer research.

As promising as the research is, we must not pin all our hopes on a miracle cure. That variety of breakthrough may still be years or decades away. We should not let dazzling possibilities divert us from other anti-cancer efforts that could yield greater reductions in cancer mortality in the near term. Among these efforts are tough enforcement of laws governing occupational hazards and environmental pollutants, expansion of the federal program that gives any physician with access to a computer terminal detailed data on state-of-the-art treatments for all kinds of cancer, use of the extensive federal data-base to target certain areas of the country or population groups that are at risk, and improvement of chemotherapy to make it more effective against cancer and less debilitating for patients.

Especially important are programs of public education that tell people how they can reduce the risk of cancer. Scientists generally agree that factors in the environment—such as chemicals in the workplace and airborne pollutants—cause as much as 7% of the cancer that strikes Americans each year. Viruses and medical procedures may be responsible for 6%, and nonenvironmental factors for 16%. This means that more than 70% of all cancer may be caused by factors that individuals themselves can control. For example, some experts suggest that poor diet (eating foods high in fat and low in fiber) may cause 35% of all cancer. there is widespread agreement in the scientific community that use of tobacco causes cancer, perhaps as many as 30% of all cases. Use of alcohol may account for 3%, and exposure to sunshine for 3%.

It is obvious that we must keep emphasizing the extent to which cancer is preventable through regulation of chemicals in the workplace, general environmental protection, and steps that people can take on their own. The federal government is doing more than ever to inform individuals how changes in their lifestyle can sharply reduce their chances of cancer. For example, it has set up a toll-free number for cancer prevention, 800-4-CANCER. Also, in recent days Congress has required tougher warning labels on cigarettes and has encouraged federal health care agencies to stress the prevention of cancer.

The war against cancer is going to be waged on dozens of fronts. The benefits of victory are potentially enormous. They surely are great enough to justify our perseverence.●

REPEAL THE POSTAL PRIVATE EXPRESS STATUTES

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that seeks to amend title 39 of the United States Code, to eliminate certain provisions relating to the private carriage of letters. This bill is in no way an attempt to destroy the U.S. Postal System [USPS], but instead, it is an effort to let America's great free market system and its competitive nature improve the existing postal system.

When Chairman John R. McKean of the Postal Service Board of Governors recently announced that first-class postage will rise to 22 cents effective February 17, he stated that,

We have no other practical option. Although the Postal Service has earned surpluses in each of the last 3 years, we have reached the point where our costs * * * have overtaken our revenues.

I believe that providing the consumer a choice is a realistic option that would not only put a halt to escalating postage costs, but would also force the USPS to become more efficient and streamlined.

When one considers that only 3 years ago postage increased from 18 to 20 cents, and that during the period between 1970 and 1976 USPS rates increased by 117 percent, one might wonder how costs could have possibly overtaken revenues. A quick look at the USPS might provide some answers. Out of every dollar allotted to the Postal Service, 83 cents goes to paying wages, salaries, and fringe benefits, while the operation of vehicles and transporting the mail is listed last in spending. In fact, the average wage of the full-time employee is higher in the post office than in any other relatively similar segment of the working population, other than miners. And yet, while pay cuts and salary freezes are being considered for other branches of the bureaucracy, the postal union has negotiated a 2.7-percent salary increase for postal employees. With labor contracts that make it all but impossible to lay off postal employees, and considering that postal workers are 90 percent unionized, it is no wonder that there is little incentive for innovation and improved service. Competing postal services would give postal employees a bigger market in which to offer their services; that would mean more jobs, a greater chance for promotion, and more opportunities for salary advancement.

About the only substantive objection that has been raised is that private firms would take the lucrative intercity business and leave the Postal Service with the responsibility for the more expensive rural delivery. This in turn would mean higher rates and more subsidies from the taxpayer. However, the fact that UPS, a private parcel post delivery unit, serves all 48 States in the continental United States and does not charge more for delivery to rural areas than to urban areas, argues convincingly against the validity of such a position. Furthermore, the proliferation of express delivery services, such as Federal Express, Purolator, Emery, Airborne, and so forth, has not driven the UPS out of this market, but instead, has forced the Postal Service to compete in this arena with their own express mail service and Zap mail. Increased competition in all aspects of mail delivery would benefit all concerned by providing cheaper, quicker, and faster service.

Finally, repealing the Private Express Statutes would free Government from the unsupportable contradiction of prosecuting monopolies on the one hand while sponsoring them on the other.●

STANDBY AUTHORITY FOR WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing legislation to provide the President with standby authority to institute wage and price controls, including restraints on interest rates, dividends, profits, and similar transfers.

There can be little doubt that the problem of ravaging, double-digit inflation has been temporarily controlled. But it is also clear that our current, relatively low inflation rate was bought at tremendous cost to the American labor force. Lacking the authority to institute wage and price controls, the administration had no other alternative than to pursue a policy that resulted in record, depression-level unemployment. While the inflation rate dropped, millions more Americans were thrust out of work.

Wage and price controls offer a fair and humane alternative to massive unemployment as a strategy for controlling inflation. While we all hope that inflation will not reappear in the short term, it is evident that we will face this problem again in the future. At that time, we should not once again place the burden of coping with inflation on the backs of poor and working Americans. Rather, we must address inflation head on with a thoughtful program of wage and price controls.

In order for wage and price controls to be effective, it is essential that the President be granted the authority to institute them in advance of increased inflation. If we wait until a new round of inflation appears before we act, prices and wage demands will accelerate in anticipation of any program of wage and price controls. Therefore, the present time, precisely because it is characterized by a relatively low inflation rate, is the appropriate time to grant the President this authority.

A voluntary wage and price standard program, while commendable, is not usually adequate. Wage and price controls must be enforceable, or they will not be likely to succeed. In any case, the President's ability to bring about either voluntary or mandatory fiscal restraints will be enhanced measurably if Congress grants him standby wage and price control authority.

The need for wage and price controls as an alternative strategy for controlling inflation is particularly urgent in light of the continued, problematic unemployment we are experiencing. While the unemployment picture has moderated somewhat from its worst levels, joblessness remains at epidemic levels. According to official figures, a full 8.2-million Americans spent the recent holiday season wondering where their next paycheck would come from and how they would feed their families. If, in response to a new round of inflation, the President were to pursue the same strategy as he did in 1981 and 1982, unemployment would be likely to reach far above any previous levels. Such a policy would spell disaster for American workers and their families, and it would seriously imperil the future of our economy.

It is highly important that we plan now to avoid such an eventuality. I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in support of standby wage and price controls, which would signal our willingness to deal with future inflation in a responsible and equitable fashion.

A copy of this legislation follows:

H.R. 225

A bill to provide authority for the President to stablize prices, wages, interest rates, and corporate dividends

OLMSTED HERITAGE LANDSCAPES ACT OF 1985

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to reintroduce, with several of my colleagues, the Olmsted Heritage Landscapes Act. The bill is similar to legislation which passed the House on August 6, 1984. Although hearings were held in the Senate, no further action was taken by the 98th Congress.

Companion legislation is being introduced in the Senate today by Senator DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN and several cosponsors. We are hopeful that the bills will be given early consideration by the 99th Congress.

The purpose of the legislation is to identify, commemorate, and preserve the legacy of historic landscapes designed by Frederick Law Olmsted, his sons and associates.

BACKGROUND AND NEED

Frederick Law Olmsted, Sr., was this country's foremost landscape architect of the 19th century. He is often referred to as the father of landscape architecture in the United States. Although perhaps best known for his work on the design of Central Park in New York, and the Capitol grounds in Washington, DC, Olmsted also inspired the development of public landscapes throughout the United States and other nations as well.

Unfortunately, a great many of these historic landscapes are threatened by inadequate maintenance, inappropriate developments, age and deteriorating infrastructure. The legislation would build on existing State, local, and private efforts to identify, commemorate, and preserve the legacy of Olmsted-inspired landscapes. Rather than create an entirely new program, the bill would use existing Federal, State, and local programs for parks, recreation, and historic preservation.

The Secretary of the Interior would coordinate the inventory of the sites, provide technical assistance and establish standards for the preservation of historic landscapes. An advisory committee would assist the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation and other agencies in carrying out their responsiblities. Participation by other public and private entities would be encouraged.

THE OLMSTED LEGACY

The legacy of Olmsted, Sr., his associates, sons and professional descendants, stretches from one end of this country to another. Of the public places alone—parks, parkways, and the like—there are over 2,000 identified sites in 37 States and the District of Columbia.

For example, in Alabama, there is the Alabama State Capitol in Montgomery and six parks in Birmingham. In California there are 23 projects, not including the Stanford University campus and Golden Gate Park, for which a report was written by Olmsted although the park was designed by John McLaren, a Scotsman working with the same design vocabulary.

In Colorado, Denver has 18 Olmsted designs, while in Washington, Seattle, boasts 33 parks, parkways, and playgrounds designed by the Olmsted firm.

In the Midwest, Ohio has Olmsted designs in Cleveland, Columbus, Dayton, Lebanon, and Youngstown. In Illinois much of the park system of Chicago was designed by Frederick Law Olmsted, Sr., including Jackson Park—the site of the Columbian Exposition in 1893—and Washington Park, which with Jackson Park, and the Midway Pleasance, constituted the South Park system.

In Kentucky there are 6 Olmsted designs in Lexington, while Louisville has 21 projects listed. One of these, Cherokee Park, was devastated by a tornado some years ago and restored using the Olmsted plans.

Maine and Maryland have Olmsted parks, as does Louisiana, Minnesota, Missouri and New Hampshire. New Jersey's entire Essex County park system is Olmstedian, while Newark's Branch Brook Park retains much of the Olmsted firms designs. Other Olmsted sites are in New Mexico, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Wisconsin, as well as enormous bodies of work in New York State and Massachusetts.

This listing, with one exception, includes only the public properties. Others include, for example, the privately owned 12,000-acre Biltmore Estate in Asheville, NC, the grounds of which were designed by Frederick Law Olmsted, Sr. Olmsted was also responsible for Druid Hills in Atlanta, a historic district which has been described as "one of his outstanding works" in a recent report.

An example of a landscape design by one of Olmsted's former associates is Stan Hywet Hall in Akron, OH, the grounds of which were planned by Warren C. Manning. The house and its gardens, now a museum operated by a nonprofit foundation, are included on the National Register of Historic Places and are designated as a national historic landmark.

Another example would be the work of George E. Kessler (1862-1923) whose landscape designs spanned approximately the same time period as Olmsted's and share similar characteristics. Kessler was one of the founders in 1917 of the American Institute of Planners and landscaped in over 40 cities and communities, including in Kansas City and St. Louis, MO; Topeka, KS; Dallas, Wichita Falls, and El Paso, TX; Oklahoma City, OK; Memphis, TN; Cincinnati and Cleveland, OH; Denver, CO; Indianapolis, IN; Salt Lake City, UT; Syracuse, NY; and Mexico City, Mexico. While not an "associate" of Olmsted's, they did correspond, and Olmsted recommended Kessler for at least one project, in Merriam, KS.

These are only a few examples which clearly show that the Olmsted legacy lives on. The work done by him and his sons, partners, and associates have influenced the development of landscape architecture throughout the world, and the places they left behind continue to be used and enjoyed by millions of people every year. This is truly part of our Nation's heritage.

CHANGES IN THE BILL

Although the bill being introduced today is essentially the same as the one which passed the House during the 98th Congress, a few changes have been made to meet several concerns raised by the administration. Most of these are of a technical or clarifying nature or they eliminate duplicative authorities or streamline the language of the bill itself.

For example, a definition of "historic landscape" is now included, which merely repeats the existing terminology in the National Historic Preservation Act but which makes the distinction between these landscapes and those defined in the bill as an "Olmsted heritage landscape."

A few specific directives in the bill, such as some of the commemorative activities to be carried out during 1985-95, were deleted, with the understanding that these would be further described in the legislative history of the bill.

Of particular note, is the fact that the bill now includes a specific authorization for appropriations of $2,500,000, effective in fiscal 1986. This is based on the Congressional Budget Office's projection last year that the program to be established under the previous bill would require between $2 million and $3 million over a 10-year period. By including the authorization, moreover, we make it very clear that this bill is not intended as a major new funding program but, rather, would simply draw on existing programs, including other funding authorities, to carry out most of its provisions.

In short, I believe that these changes will improve the opportunity for enactment during the 99th Congress, and I encourage other Members to join as cosponsors of the legislation.●

REVIEW OF VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION DECISIONS

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, today I have prepared for introduction legislation to allow veterans access to the courts for review of Veterans' Administration decisions.

This bill, I feel, is a long needed one which would provide our Nation's veterans the same rights of judicial review that other citizens enjoy. Specifically, the bill would codify VA procedures—and if a veteran feels aggrieved by a final decision of the VA's Board of Veterans' Appeals, court review of that decision would be allowed.

All of us can appeal to the courts for a whole variety of civil complaints. This bill gives veterans the same option in a clear and equitable fashion by recognizing a right long overdue them.

Thank you.●

PAY EQUITY

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today, I am reintroducing two bills which would ensure more equitable pay practices for millions of our Nation's workers. Each bill, the Pay Equity Act of 1985 and the Federal Pay Equity Act of 1985, was the subject of comprehensive hearings held by my Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits during the last Congress.

More than 20 years ago, Congress passed the Equal Pay Act of 1963 which ensured equal pay for equal work, regardless of race, color, national origin, religion, or sex; 1 year later, Congress passed another significant piece of legislation, the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Contained in the act was a section, title VII, which took the concept of equal pay for equal work one step further by stating that women could not be paid less than men even when job content differs. While both these laws are important to workers, discrimination in the marketplace continues to exist.

For decades, employers have used gender as a determining factor when setting pay rates. And, systematically, wages have become depressed for jobs dominated by women. Teachers, nurses, secretaries, and service industry workers have become the victims of sex-based wage discrimination regardless of whether they are men or women. Gender alone has commanded their wages. The result has been a 30-year-old wage gap between male and female workers, averaging 40 percent.

Part of the problem can be attributed to the Federal Government. The Government's commitment to eliminating sex-based wage discrimination has been nonexistent under President Reagan. In fact, this administration has gone out of its way to ridicule and denounce pay equity, claiming that market forces will close the earnings gap in time. The Federal Government's inactivity has given employers the green light to continue practicing sex-based wage discrimination with impunity.

My first bill, the Pay Equity Act of 1985, would mandate the agencies responsible for enforcing the Equal Pay Act, the Civil Rights Act, and certain Executive orders to report to the President and the Congress on their enforcement activity. Specifically, each agency—the EEOC, the Department of Justice, and the Department of Labor—would give detailed information on the number of pay discrimination cases filed, the number processed, and the nature of the complaints. The bill would also mandate the EEOC to establish an educational program on eliminating sex-based wage discrimination from private-sector pay systems. The educational program would be available for all employers wanting to know about the most effective means of restructuring their pay scales.

The second bill, the Federal Pay Equity Act of 1985, would mandate the U.S. Office of Personnel Management to hire a private consultant to examine the Federal pay and classification systems to determine whether or to what extent gender is used as a factor in setting Federal workers' pay rates. This bill is exactly the same as title I of H.R. 5680, which passed the House by a record vote of 413 to 6 on June 28, 1984. Unfortunately, the bill was not acted upon in the Senate and has been moved to this year's agenda.

At the end of the last session, Senators ALAN CRANSTON of California and TED STEVENS of Alaska, after engaging in a colloquy on pay equity, agreed to cosign a letter to the General Accounting Office requesting a preliminary report on the best means of conducting a complete pay equity study of the executive branch of the Federal Government. They also agreed that the GAO report would be subject to hearings in the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee in March. The letter to GAO, dated November 15, 1984, was also signed by myself, Congressman WILLIAM D. FORD of Michigan, Congressman BARNEY FRANK of Massachusetts, Congresswoman PATRICIA SCHROEDER of Colorado, Senators JEFF BINGAMAN of New Mexico, THOMAS EAGLETON of Missouri, DAN EVANS of Washington, and DAVE DURENBERGER of Minnesota. The GAO's preliminary analysis of how the Federal Government could best conduct a pay equity study will be valuable in reaching the ultimate goal of enacting my legislation into law.

A recent study released by the GAO revealed that most women working for the Federal Government are concentrated in the lower seven grades, typically occupying traditionally female-dominated jobs. These Federal employees are no different from their coworkers in the private sector. They are at the lower end of the pay scale, and while more women are moving into nontraditional occupations, occupations viewed as women's jobs remain sadly underpaid. What needs to happen at the Federal level is a sincere commitment to enforce existing laws and ensure the Nation's work force that their pay scales are not marred by prejudice.

State and local governments are reexamining their pay scales to determine whether sex-based wage discrimination exists. Some private corporations are also taking the initiative to study their pay and classification systems to see if they are operating within the framework of the law. Yet, that the Federal Government is doing nothing.

I am certain that my colleagues share with me a desire for more equitable treatment of our Nation's workers. We must end this blatant form of wage discrimination against working women. My legislation would be an important step for the Federal Government to reaffirm its commitment to this basic civil right. I encourage my colleagues to cosponsor these bills and participate in the hearings I will be holding next month.

Thank you.●

THE AMERICAN GOLD EAGLE COIN ACT OF 1985

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the "American Gold Eagle Coin Act of 1985," which provides for the minting of two coins which bear the same design, but each containing a different weight of gold: one ounce and one-half ounce.

The design of the new American Eagle would be the figure of "Walking Liberty" from the 1908 St. Gaudens' double eagle on the obverse, and on the reverse, the heraldic eagle of the Great Seal of the United States. The coins would not be denominated by a dollar value, but as was the case with the first American gold coins, by weight only.

As official coins of the United States, the new American Eagles would not be sold as the gold medallions minted under the American Arts Medallions Act are, but exchanged for other official currencies of the United States through the banking system. Just as with Federal Reserve notes and the present clad coinage, there would be no tax imposed on the exchange of such coins. The new gold coins would be acceptable in the settlement of private debts, just like any other official money, but unlike any other moneys, the coins would not be acceptable in the payment of any Federal taxes, duties, or dues.

The coins could be minted from the Treasury's own stock of gold, up to a maximum of 10 million ounces, and any owner of gold bullion or foreign gold coins would be able to deliver them to a mint of the United States and receive in exchange an equal weight of American Eagles.

The power to coin money is expressly delegated to the Congress under Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution. The meaning of this phrase is clear, but Congress has been ignoring it for the past 70 years, ever since it delegated power to the Federal Reserve System to print money and create credit ex nihilo. Over those 70 years, our Nation has been plagued with the worst depression, inflations, unemployments, recessions, bankruptcy, and interest rates in our history. Nothing we suffered under an imperfect gold standard during the 19th century can compare to the damage our economy has sustained under the management of the Federal Reserve.

The authors of the Constitution wrote Article I, Section 8 precisely for the purpose of outlawing the type of monetary system we have now. The use of the word "coin" rather than the word "print," or the phrase "emit bills of credit," was deliberately placed in the Constitution as a reaction to the debacle created by paper money printed and issued by the Continental Congress during the Revolutionary War. It is significant to note that this power of coining money is mentioned in the same sentence in the Constitution as the power to "fix the standards of weights and measures," for the framers regarded money as a weight of metal and a measure of value.

For decades now, but especially for the past 10 years, we have had a medium of exchange, the Federal Reserve note, which is fluctuating in its value. As Roger Sherman, a delegate to the Constitutional Convention, wrote, "If what is used as a medium of exchange is fluctuating in its value, it is no better than unjust weights and measures * * * which are condemned by the Laws of God and man." With the issuance of new gold coins by the Treasury, the Federal Reserve's monopoly on money will be challenged. The "American Gold Eagle Coin Act of 1985" represents a major step toward the eventual replacement of our present irredeemable paper money system with a gold based system.●

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION EQUITY FOR THE JOBLESS

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing legislation I first introduced in the last Congress to correct an inequity in Federal Supplemental Compensation as it affects certain laidoff workers.

In 1981, one of the major tire companies headquartered in my congressional district shut down a plant, laying off several hundred workers. Some of the employees chose early retirement, foregoing any chance of a recall in the event that the plant reopened. Under unemployment compensation law, these workers were also entitled to unemployment benefits, offset dollar for dollar by their pensions.

Many other workers instead decided to place their faith in the economy and chose to be laid off, trusting that they would be recalled before their unemployment compensation ran out. That never happened, and these workers have, of course, long since exhausted their unemployment benefits. Eligible workers from this group were finally themselves forced to retire once their unemployment benefits ran out.

Unfortunately, this latter group of workers ultimately received considerably less unemployment compensation than those workers who chose to accept immediate retirement when the plant closed. This is so even though both groups of workers performed the same work for the same wages and are now receiving the same pensions. It is this inequity which my bill seeks to remedy.

Because of the manner in which Ohio treats the disbursal of State unemployment compensation, workers at the tire plant who in 1981 chose immediate early retirement received the offset unemployment compensation to which they were also entitled over a long enough period of time to enable them to qualify for the Federal Supplemental Compensation [FSC] Program that Congress authorized beginning in September 1982.

Workers at the same tire plant who chose not to retire exhausted their unemployment compensation roughly 1 month before the eligibility date for the FSC Program, and thus did not qualify for benefits. This latter group of workers is simply asking for the same FSC benefits, offset dollar for dollar by their pensions, that those workers who chose immediate early retirement actually received. I am convinced they are entitled to those benefits, and my bill would authorize the payment of the missing FSC benefits, as offset by their pensions, in either a lump sum or a scheduled payment. The cost per individual would be negligible. The Ways and Means Committee indicated last year that the plight of these Ohio workers is not unique. Indeed, I suspect this inequity is nationwide.

Enactment of my bill would provide laidoff workers with the benefits they should have received in the first place. I urge its adoption.●

THE DEFENSE ECONOMIC ADJUSTMENT ACT

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing legislation to create a national plan for the economic conversion of our defense plants and military bases to civilian production. This bill, the Defense Economic Adjustment Act, will provide a significant impetus both for meaningful arms control and long-term economic renewal.

We are all aware of the ongoing pressure for an ever larger defense budget that inches us closer and closer to an unimaginable fate every year. Regrettably, this pressure is generated not only by concern over our national security, but by concern over the need to preserve and create jobs. Year after year, as crucial votes on individual weapons systems approach, Members of Congress are urged to approve these weapons, not because they are needed for the defense of our Nation, but because they will create jobs for their constituents.

In an era of continued, problematic unemployment, concern over joblessness is legitimate and understandable. But when it serves to encourage the approval of unneeded weapons of mass destruction, it becomes a tragedy for all involved. It is a tragedy for the workers who produce these weapons, whose needs would be better served by appropriate civilian spending. And it is a tragedy for all people around the world, who daily face the prospect of nuclear annihilation.

By creating viable alternatives to military spending, the Defense Economic Adjustment Act would assure the millions of workers in military-dependent industries that their jobs will not be sacrificed in the effort to achieve an arms control accord. As a result, proposals for increased military spending would more likely be assessed on their merits, rather than for reasons of job creation. And, as one of the chief reasons for support of wasteful military expenditures is diminished, the propsects for ending the arms race would be significantly enhanced.

Not only will economic conversion encourage arms control, but it will promote a sorely needed revitalization of our Nation's economy. It is quite clear that we are now shifting the burden of paying for our military hardware to future generations through deficits of massive proportions. But it is not only our method of financing military production that is destroying our economy. It is also the nature of that production itself. There is a growing body of evidence that explodes the myth of prosperity through continually increased arms production. While administration officials continue to point to the alleged economic stimulus resulting from military spending, the hard facts demonstrate otherwise.

The military economy is unique in that the money spent on the military has left our economy for good. Production focused on defense creates nothing of value for consumers or producers. No one will ever ride a Trident II missile to the office or live in a Minuteman silo. Moreover, increased productivity is sacrificed when more and more resources are devoted to military, rather than civilian, purposes. In other words, not only are the dollars in the military budget unavailable for other uses, but the added benefits that commonly result from civilian production are not realized.

There is also compelling evidence that military production creates significantly fewer jobs than comparable spending in the civilian sphere. For instance, total employment per $1 billion spent is estimated at 20,715 for guided missile and space vehicle production. This compares with 30,394 jobs created in the motor vehicles industry and 71,550 jobs created in educational services, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

These factors indicate that military spending is more than a drain on the Treasury. It represents a structural flaw in the American economy that raises unemployment rates and contributes to the progressive decline of American industries in relation to their foreign competitors.

The military budget's oppressive drag on the economy demonstrates the urgent need for a national plan for conversion to civilian production. The vast production resources used up in the arms race would, if applied to the civilian economy, encourage productive development on a national scale, reversing the dangerous decline of key industries that we are now experiencing. It is time to recognize economic conversion as a crucial element of an industrial strategy for our future.

However, it is much more difficult to shift resources from military to civilian uses without providing for the workers who depend on military contracts for their livelihood. The purpose of the Defense Economic Adjustment Act is to guarantee that these workers will not alone bear the burden of any decision to reduce military spending. The bill contains four important provisions aimed at encouraging and easing a transition to civilian production in the event that Congress and the President determine that a particular military contract is no longer useful. It is a decentralized plan that would provide civilian employment for workers facing cutbacks in military contracts and stabilize local economies that are heavily dependent on military spending.

First, the bill calls for the creation of alternative use committees in every defense facility of 100 workers or more. These committees, composed 50-50 of labor and management representatives, develop blueprint-ready plans for alternative civilian products. Without advance planning for conversion, a decision to halt or reduce military production would create nothing but increased unemployment and economic disruption.

Second, the bill creates a cabinet-level Defense Economic Adjustment Council charged with developing plans for public projects that address human needs. The Council would also act as a clearinghouse on existing Federal programs relevant to communities affected by military cutbacks and publish a guidebook for local conversion planners.

Third, the bill calls for 1 year's advance notification of plans to cutback or terminate a defense contract or military base. The Defense Economic Adjustment Council would be responsible for informing the appropriate local officials and alternative use committees of pending cutbacks.

Fourth, the bill would provide for adjustment assistance for communities and workers while a conversion is underway. Communities seriously affected by defense cutbacks would be eligible for Federal planning assistance, and individual workers displaced in the course of a conversion would be eligible for adjustment benefits, including funds for retraining, for up to 2 years following their displacement.

The comprehensive plan for economic conversion contained in the Defense Economic Adjustment Act would free us from the tyranny of jobs blackmail in the approval of military contracts and allow us to pursue a lasting peace wholeheartedly without sacificing our commitment to full employment. I would also contribute to our Nation's long-term, economic survival by providing the resources for the revitalization of basic industries and the repair of our infrastructure.

Economic conversion provides the hope that humanity will manage to survive into a better and more peaceful tomorrow. It is in this spirit that I urge my colleagues to join me in support of the Defense Economic Adjustment Act.●

VOLUNTARY PRAYER IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, today I am again introducing legislation proposing an amendment to the Constitution to allow for voluntary prayer in public buildings. This effort to allow persons assembled in public buildings to offer prayer is one I have undertaken since first coming to Congress 20 years ago in 1965.

Public prayer has been a freedom that the citizens of this country have enjoyed since the very beginning of our heritage until the Supreme Court's decision in 1963 which forbade this practice.

Our daily sessions in Congress begin with a prayer—many public convocations begin with a prayer—and certainly no one can argue the need for prayer in our society.

It is my belief that the faith we have shown as a nation is the main reason we have grown to become a world leader in every area of development. I feel that a sincere recognition of our dependence on the power of prayer will bring us through any crisis our Nation might ever face.

For these reasons, I support and encourage efforts to amend the Constitution to allow nondenominational prayer to be offered in public buildings. Thank you.●

CONVERSION TO METRIC

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to amend the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 to provide that the functions of the Federal Government with respect to the metric system shall be limited to coordinating the conversion to such system in areas or industries which desire it, and keeping the public informed thereon, without encouraging in any way the adoption or use of such system. The decision to convert to metric should be made by the public and implemented through congressional legislation and should not be mandated or promoted by the bureaucracy.

The authority to fix the standards of weights and measures was specifically granted to the Congress under article I, section 8 of the U.S. Constitution. To date, Congress has never authorized nor endorsed forced conversion to metric. This is not to say that I am opposed to the voluntary use of the metric system by individuals and businesses in this country. Indeed, it has been the policy of the United States since 1866 to allow the use of either metric or our customary American system of weights and measures. However, the Government s unwarranted promotion and costly imposition of metric on the American people who have indicated in poll after poll that they do not wish to convert and stand no benefit on account of conversion must be stopped.

It is the responsibility of Congress to authorize a major change in weights and measurements, and therefore, attempts to subversively implement this change must be eliminated by forbidding the Government's encouragement of such system against the will and fiscal discretion of the public.●

COMPARABLE WORTH AND PAY EQUITY

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, only a Neanderthal is today opposed to equal pay for equal work, as required by the Equal Pay Act of 1963, and generally interpreted to mean equal pay for substantially equal work. Recently, however, there have been important challenges to the meaning of that phrase which, if sustained by the courts or specifically written into law, will have very important socio-economic consequences.

The issue is comparable worth, or its rising surrogate pay equity. These terms are relatively new to the political lexicon and are generally defined as equal pay for work of comparable value or comparable worth. Proponents of comparable worth argue that title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 goes beyond the Equal Pay Act to prohibit pay discrimination between jobs that are substantially different in content, such as truckers and secretaries. Even as the matter is before the courts, the public policy debate is joined.

I am not a judge, but I am a lawmaker, and I have little doubt that the debate over comparable worth will intensify regardless of the outcome of pending court cases. And as a lawmaker, I have serious concerns about the consequences of a comparable worth policy. My purpose here is to elaborate on these concerns.

While there is agreement that comparable worth is not equal pay for equal work, there is confusion about what the term means.

The House Wednesday Group to which I belong recently released a report on "Women's Issues" that tacitly embraces comparable worth, yet the closest attempt at a definition is a statement of what comparable worth is not.

Liberal columnist William Raspberry, an opponent of comparable worth, defines it as "equal pay for work of comparable worth." But in a Washington Post letter to the editor, Representatives Geraldine Ferraro, MARY ROSE OAKAR, and PATRICIA SCHROEDER, proponents of comparable worth, accuse Raspberry of having "it" all wrong. In their view:

> Pay equity is about paying women and men what their jobs are worth * * * Jobs held primarily by women * * * are indispensable to their employers and to society * * * [and these] jobs are underpaid.

Frankly, I'm not sure I see the difference.

Definitions of comparable worth generally share the same characteristic: they beg the question, and they skirt the issue of defining "worth" or "value."

The problems with comparable worth, however, only begin with mushy definitions. As noted in a July 30, 1984, Cincinnati Enquirer editorial, even when one overcomes the definitional difficulties, comparable worth "gets more vague."

What, if anything, do an ounce of gold, a glass of water, a piece of art, and a particular job all have in common? None possess any intrinsic worth. Other things being equal, water generally commands a lower price than diamonds, gold, or Picassos, but it is not difficult to imagine circumstances in which a glass of water is worth more than any of these things. However innately, and politically, attractive the notion of "true" or "intrinsic" value or worth may be, it is, nevertheless, analytical hokum.

Prices—economic values—are determined by the interaction of supply and demand. If more qualified people seek a particular job, the wage for that job will tend to be lower than it would be with fewer applicants regardless of how useful or valuable the job as perceived from the standpoint of nonmarket criteria.

Economic value is far removed from notions of comparable worth. Worth and work are not the same. Comparable worth advocates key on work effort or the nature of a job, or worker qualifications, but they essentially ignore economic value. In point of fact, this is the old Marxist labor theory of value, which nowadays, even modern-day Marxists generally reject.

Perhaps because they key element of comparable worth—the notion of true of intrinsic value—is analytically useless, proponents of comparable worth have sougth to rationalize their quest through the scientific or objective vehicle of job evaluations.

Comparable worth advocates seek to elevate job evaluations into dominant roles in salary and wage determinations. Used this way, job evaluations are essentially nonmarket techniques of assessing job worth based on a system of points defined and awarded by experts. Without question, job evaluations have proven useful and worthwhile in personnel work in both public and private sectors, but as a key mechanism for determining job worth, they are subjective analytical rationalizations.

In "Women, Work, and Wages," the National Academy of Sciences states, "We do not believe that the value—or worth—of jobs can be determined by scientific methods. Hierarchies of job worth are always, at least in part—a reflection of values."

The National Foundation for the Study of Equal Employment policy, in "A Closer Look at Comparable Worth," notes several inherent features of job evaluations which make them useful as managerial tools, but questionable "as a general legal mandate" in the implementation of comparable worth standards.

And according to the National Foundation for the Study of Equal Employment Policy,

> Our society's few limited experiments with programs that have taken these decisions out of the employer's hands or subjected them to external controls . . . have been extremely unpopular and widely regarded as unsuccessful.

Market prices are not universal worth values. There are no such things. Nor do they arise from a number of points awarded by a group of experts. But market prices do reflect the willingness of buyers—employers—and sellers—employees—to pay for a certain labor service at a particular time and place. If wages are set below the market rate, any employer will not be able to attract qualified applicants, and will begin to lose those it already has. If wages are set above the market rate, there will be a surplus of qualified applicants. Both situations are observed, especially in Government where nonmarket wage setting is common. True, some Government jobs remain vacant for lack of qualified applicants, indicative of a wage set too low, but typically, they have long lists of qualified applicants, indicative of a wage set too high.

No person or group of persons or computer, for that matter could ever possess, let alone process, the enormous amount of information necessary to determine wages as efficiently as the market. The wage market is not perfect, but nonmarket alternatives to wage setting are usually second best.

This was graphically demonstrated in Christensen versus State of Iowa. At a State university in Iowa, job evaluations ranked predominantly female clerical jobs at the same level of worth as predominantly make physical plant jobs. The local job market, however, dictated higher wages for physical plant jobs than under the university system. At the evaluated level, the university had no difficulty hiring clerical workers, while the physical plant jobs lacked qualified applicants. The university was forced to increase the wage for the physical plant jobs, and the court found this supplementary wage nondiscriminatory because the law does not require an employer to ignore the labor market in setting wage rates. Question: Should the school have also raised the salaries of clerical workers?

Advocates of comparable worth are not content to place their reliance on the outcome of job evaluations. Their proposals, for example, H.R. 5680, introduced in the last Congress, are hedged by permitting only upward revisions of wages, a proviso that carries with it not only significant equity questions, but a formidable price tag as well.

In 1979 a study on Minnesota State jobs by Hay Associates revealed that female-dominated jobs were paid less than male dominated jobs of comparable worth. In order to meet the standard of equal pay for jobs of comparable value about 8,225 State employees will receive raises averaging $1,600 over 2 years. This program, hailed by comparable worth proponents as an exemplary success, plans to meet its pay equity goal after 3 years time, at a cost to Minnesota taxpayers of $44 million.

Daniel Glasner, an executive with Hay Associates calculates the cost of implementing comparable worth standards on a national basis to be about $320 billion, nearly a tenth of gross national product, with a 10 percent jump in inflation. Similarly, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce puts the price at $300 billion.

Perhaps the reason comparable worth has achieved any political currency at all is the a priori conclusion that some people draw from what are indisputable facts.

Women and men are unevenly distributed among different jobs in our economy: In 1982, half of all women workers were crowded into 20 of the 440 occupations as categorized by the Bureau of Labor Statistics; on average, women earn only about 64 cents for every dollar earned by men.

Is sex discrimination the reason for this sad state of affairs? No doubt sex discrimination is a factor, but it is wrong to conclude that it is the sole, or even a major, factor without first considering other possible nondiscriminatory causes and their relative importance. These include job-related qualifications, education and training, work experience, seniority, number of hours worked, and work force continuity. The a priori conclusion would be warranted only if these additional factors are de minimus. The evidence is that they are not. For example by adjusting for difference in hours worked by men and women, the wage gap narrows to 72 cents.

For example, Census Bureau studies have found that continuity of lifetime work experience is an especially important determinant of earnings. The reason is that, upon every reentry, a worker may start at or near the bottom of the salary ladder, whereas continuous work force involvement generally means a steady climb up the pay ladder. It is a fact that the former applies generally to women and the latter to men; typically in the past, working women have had less overall work experience and less continuous work experience than working men.

Using only publicly available data, a report by the National Academy of Science found that 44 percent of the wage differential between men and women can be explained by factors such as work history 30 percent, education 2 percent, and labor force attachment 3 percent. A second report, again using only publicly available data, by the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco asserts that two-thirds of the wage differential can be explained by worker characteristics. The conclusion frequently heard is that the unexplained portion of the wage gap is due entirely to sex discrimination, yet this is not the conclusion of either study.

The real question is posed by Randall Pozdena, the author of the latter report:

> Is the remaining wage gap due to discrimination of or insufficient data for identifying other important worker attributes? This is an extremely difficult question to answer. Sufficient data to account for all relevant worker and job attributes exist—if at all—only with an individual firm's employment records. Such information, however, is rarely made available to academic analysts.

Thus, it is not surprising that few studies have actually undertaken the task of sorting out possible explanatory factors, including sex discrimination.

In the few well-documented studies using more detailed nonpublic personnel records, the explained earnings differential is narrowed considerably. The key variable not generally available from public data is worker qualifications. According to Pozdena, these studies suggest, * * * > * * * that economic or statistical discrimination by employers does not play a major role in generating observed wage differences in men and women. Rather, as the model of competitive labor markets would suggest, overall, employers make their decisions based on work-related attributes of the worker. * * *

In Briggs versus City of Madison, Federal District Judge Barbara Crabb recognized the complexities of the problem: * * *

> I find unpersuasive the basic premise that . . . any one possesses the intellectual tools and data base that would enable them to identify the extent to which the factor of discrimination has contributed to, or created, sex segregated jobs, and to separate that factor from the myriad of nondiscriminatory factors that may have contributed to the same result. * * *

In the court's view, there are significant nondiscriminatory factors that contribute to the wage gap between men and women. These include: "* * * familial and peer expectations, desire for part-time work or work with flexible hours, reluctance to pioneer in nontraditional fields, the absence of 'role models' in nontraditional jobs, and lack of information about higher paying jobs."

Indeed, much of what is observed today is the result of deliberate, if not blatant, occupational segregation in the past—women couldn't get into professional schools, for example. There is also the question that, to the extent occupational choices of men and women differed and were not impeded by discriminatory practices, they are reflective of a social structure in which women's roles have been different than men's rather than of sex discrimination.

Regardless of one's view of historic traditions, they have influenced women's job choices. Brigette Berger, a sociologist at Wellesley College, has produced empirical data to support her argument that most American women work to help their families. Thus, women have generally taken certain kinds of jobs more often than men in search of such features as easy exit and entrance, and hour and job requirements compatible with their principal concerns.

According to June O'Neill, of the Urban Institute,

> Research suggests that pay in female occupations for both women and men is lower because of differences in education and on-the-job experience as well as differences in hours and other working conditions such as exposure to hazards or outdoor work.

It is true that women have not had the same opportunities or experiences that lead to better paying jobs. But it is also true that women who have been in the work force for numerous years did not originally prepare for lifetime careers; women have tended to invest less than men in future earnings potential through job training, job search, education, and other long-range income-increasing investments.

Such patterns have been changing, but what is observed—what people tend to focus on—are the consequences of historic roles as much or more than sex discrimination.

Until very recently, wage statistics had not begun to reflect changing societal patterns and employment policies on the earnings of women. According to the Census Bureau, part of the reason might have been the massive increase of women entering the labor force from 35 percent to 50 since 1950: "The entry of large numbers of inexperienced women into the work force undoubtedly drove down the average wages of women."

But a new report by the Rand Corp. reveals that the wage gap between men and women is "narrowing rapidly * * * and jumped from 60 to 64 percent in the last 4 years." The authors cite improving education and work experience as reasons for the gains, and note that the findings "suggest that the gap is narrowing and is not as immutable as it appears," as comparable worth proponents suggest.

Comparable worth might make some sense if occupational segregation and pay differentials stemmed from employer-imposed sex discrimination. But to the extent that present pay differentials result from society having shunted women into certain job categories in the past—resulting in excess supply and relatively lower wages—then comparable worth won't help.

Despite admirable intentions by its proponents, a comparable worth policy simply would not have the desired results. Most likely, occupational segregation would worsen.

A study of State jobs in Iowa revealed that the wage gap would be narrowed if wages were set in accordance with the statewide job evaluation system, but that the pay differential would not disappear. The study concluded that the remaining differential would be overcome only when women move in greater numbers into "nontraditional jobs."

Yet raising the pay of traditionally female jobs would lower the incentive for women to move out of these jobs. Instituting broad-based pay scales based on comparable worth notions would, according to O'Neill:

> * * * likely retard the substantial progress that has been made in the past decade * * * Women have moved into predominantly male occupations, and younger women have dramatically shifted their educational and occupational goals. they have been undertaking the additional training required for law, medicine and engineering because the higher pay they can obtain from the investment makes it worthwhile.

Or, according to Raspberry,

If you upgrade them [female-dominated jobs] enough to satisfy comparable worth advocates, those jobs would become attractive to men which means that women would be right back in the business of fighting sex discrimination, * * * It makes more sense to [Linda] Chavez [Staff Director of the Civil Rights Commission] and to me—to fight it now.

Furthermore, raising the wages of lower paying, female-dominated jobs would result in an additional perverse effect for women. As labor costs rise, firms shift from labor to capital—that is, people are replaced with machines.

Another ironic aspect of comparable worth concerns its scope of coverage. Advocates of comparable worth generally say that the intent is for comparable worth to apply within employer groups—for example, an individual firm or a private school—rather than entire industries—all steel companies, all universities—and to the public rather than the private sector. There is, however, reason enough to question these assertions.

Comparable worth would only work as intended if it were applied for entire industries, and then, only through Government coercion. If some firms voluntarily adopted comparable worth personnel policies, the resulting wage differentials would immediately come under market forces indicative of the self-imposed competitive disadvantage of the comparable worth firms. The resulting economic disequilibrium would tend to correct itself in the direction of least costs, that is, away from comparable worth. It is for this reason that it is hard to imagine very many firms voluntarily adopting comparable worth.

Apparently, this reasoning has not been lost on congressional supporters of comparable worth. According to the Congressional Research Service, one of the principal pay equity bills in the last Congress, H.R. 5092, would indeed impose comparable worth criteria on the private sector. Of course, in the case of the public sector, all that is required is the necessary political clout to institute the policy as was done in Minnesota.

If the private sector is motivated to use comparable worth—whether as a result of a collective bargaining process, being enamored with the science of job evaluations, or by the prestige of having outside experts set wage rates—that is fine with me, so long as it is not coerced into doing so by Government. Government should be neutral and not try to impose a solution because the principle behind the policy is so foggy and the consequences of the policy are so clearly counterproductive.

As for the public sector, Government should move away from, rather than toward, comparable worth. We already have too much inefficiency and excess cost in government, resulting, in my opinion, in no small part from nonmarket wage setting and personnel practices. We should not add additional institutionalized inefficiencies under the nebulous rubric of comparable worth.

The eradication of sex discrimination in hiring practices, equal pay for equal work, upward mobility, and the elimination of occupational segregation are not issues; they are goals. As such, they are not in dispute. The real question is how to achieve these important goals.

Markets are never perfect. Even if they were, not all public policies should be based on market considerations. Advocates of comparable worth assume, erroneously, that occupational segregation is a primary result of sex discrimination which can best be solved by moving away from the market. They further assume that the value of work is intrinsic, that is, it can be measured without reference to supply or demand factors. But the evidence indicates that neither market failure nor sex discrimination is the reason for the occupational segregation that is observed today. If anything, nonmarket approaches and historic societal roles, not market failures, have been the major contributor.

Sex discrimination is intolerable and ought to be costly to those who practice it. Government should ensure this cost by vigorous enforcement of strong antisex discrimination laws, not by promoting or dictating arbitrary, costly, and counterproductive controls.

Sound public policy is more likely to result from sound analysis, and poor public policy from poor, or nonexistent, analysis. Ideas that sound good often gain political currency and become public policy based more on their good-sounding name than on sound analysis. Comparable worth, or pay equity, is a case in point. We should define and analyze our terms when we make policy.

Good intentions are important—perhaps even necessary—to the making of good public policy. But however necessary they may be, good intentions are generally insufficient. How fair is it to encourage or subsidize women to stay in jobs described by Congresswoman OLYMPIA SNOWE as "dead end"?

I'm strongly in favor of paying people what their jobs are worth, but comparable worth has nothing to do with paying people what their jobs are worth.●

LEGISLATION TO PROTECT THE PUBLIC FROM POTENTIAL DANGERS OF IONIZATION SMOKE DETECTORS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing today two pieces of legislation designed to protect the public from the potential dangers of ionization-type smoke detectors.

One bill would provide that all ionization smoke detectors bear a warning label specifying that they contain radioactive materials. The other would ban the sale of ionization smoke detectors completely.

Ionization smoke detectors, which currently account for the large majority of all marketed smoke detectors, contain a highly radioactive substance, usually americium-241.

Many scientists and radiologists have noted that americium-241, a byproduct of the nuclear cycle, represents a serious threat to human health if ingested and to the environment if improperly disposed. Americium-241 is 53 times more radioactive by weight than plutonium-239 and has a half-life of 458 years. Experts claim that ingestion of even a minute amount of americium-241 can cause cancer.

However, many manufacturers of ionization smoke detectors fail to inform the consuming public of the presence of this radioactive material—either on the packaging material or the unit itself. Nor do the manufacturers properly stress the need to dispose of ionization smoke detectors in a safe, carefully regulated manner.

Perhaps unwittingly, Federal regulations mandating installation of unspecified types of smoke detectors in homes built with FHA or VA assistance have boosted the sales of ionization detectors. Thousands of State and local laws requiring smoke detectors in all homes are now in force. Because ionization detectors are more readily available and lower priced than the major competitor, the photoelectric detector, they are often the choice of purchasers of large quantities, such as a housing authority. Consequently, as many as 20 million ionization smoke detectors may now be in operation.

Since purchasers of ionization smoke detectors are not being notified properly about potential radiation dangers or disposal procedures, it seem inevitable that some of the americium-241 from smoke detectors will enter the environment eventually and, ultimately, enter the human food chain. The inadvertent disposal of all kinds of hazardous waste by consumers at home—from pesticides to motor oil—is a growing and, until recently, unpublicized problem.

The photoelectric detector is a safe and reliable alternative to the ionization-type detector. Photoelectric smoke detectors contain no radioactive substances. Comparison testing has shown that the photoelectric smoke detector is as effective in providing fast smoke alerts as the ionization type, and in fact is more effective in the detection of a smoldering fire which is most common in household blazes. The only drawback is the photoelectric's slightly higher price.

Interest around the country in banning ionization detectors at the municipal level has increased in recent years. In June 1980, the District of Columbia issued an administrative policy decision to purchase only photoelectric smoke detectors because "the photoelectric models are safer, generally more efficient and effective" and because "future health hazards relating to disposal are eliminated." In Buffalo, NY, last year, the city council debated a resolution urging a similar decision. My legislation would provide leadership at the Federal level on this issue.

I hope my colleagues will recognize the danger posed by this product and join me by cosponsoring my legislation to ban its sale or require warning labels on each detector sold.

The text of the two bills follows:

H.R. 226

A bill to provide that ionization smoke detectors containing any radioactive isotope shall be considered banned hazardous substances subject to the prohibitions of the Federal Hazardous Substances Act

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any ionization device which—

(1) is designed to detect the presence of smoke in the atmosphere; and

(2) contains any radioactive isotope; shall be considered to be a banned hazardous substance for purposes of the Federal Hazardous Substances Act (15 U.S.C. 1261 et seq.), and shall be subject to the prohibitions established in section 4 of such Act (15 U.S.C. 1263) and to the other provisions of such Act.

SEC. 2. Any person who violates the provisions of section 4 of the Federal Hazardous Substances Act (15 U.S.C. 1263), in connection with the manufacture of the device specified in the first section of this Act, or in connection with the introduction or delivery for introduction of such device into interstate commerce, shall be subject to the penalties established in section 5 of such Act (15 U.S.C. 1264).

SEC. 3. The device specified in the first section of this Act shall be liable to seizure in accordance with the provisions of section 6 of the Federal Hazardous Substances Act (15 U.S.C. 1265).

A bill to provide that ionization smoke detectors shall bear a label specifying that they contain radioactive materials

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in the packaging or labeling of any ionization smoke detection device for distribution in commerce, or for any person (other than a common carrier for hire, a contract carrier for hire, or a freight forwarder for hire) engaged in the distribution in commerce of any packaged or labeled ionization smoke detection device, to distribute or to cause to be distributed in commerce any such device if such device is not labeled in a manner which complies with the requirements of section 2.

SEC. 2. (a) Any ionization smoke detection device distributed in commerce shall bear a label which—

(1) includes a recognized symbol indicating the presence of radioactive material; and

(2) bears the following statement: "This device contains radioactive material which may be hazardous to your health if ingested or improperly disposed.".

(b) The label required in subsection (a) shall be affixed to the outside back panel or portion of any ionization smoke detection device, and to any package containing such a device.

SEC. 3. Any violation of the first section of this Act shall constitute an unfair or deceptive act or practice in commerce in violation of section 5(a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act and shall be subject to enforcement under section 5(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

SEC. 4. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "commerce" means—

(A) commerce between any State, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, or any territory or possession of the United States, and any place outside thereof; and

(B) commerce within the District of Columbia or within any territory or possession of the United States not organized with a legislative body; but such term does not include exports to foreign countries; and

(2) the term "ionization smoke detection device" means any device which—

(A) is designed to detect the presence of smoke in the atmosphere; and

(B) contains any radioactive isotope.

SEC. 5. The provisions of this Act shall apply to any ionization smoke detection device which is available for retail sale in commerce after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

BIAGGI SAYS NORTHERN IRELAND NEEDS A SPECIAL ENVOY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the bipartisan Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs, I am proud on this first day of the 99th Congress to introduce an important concurrent resolution calling on President Reagan to designate a Special Envoy for Northern Ireland.

This resolution is identical to one I had sponsored in the 98th Congress as House Concurrent Resolution 189. Its need is perhaps more compelling now than before largely because of the absence of any real movement toward a political solution to the Northern Ireland issue.

The absence of movement is more tragic because of the fact that there has been ample opportunities for progress on the political front. The issuance of the report by the New Ireland Forum in the middle of 1984 provided an important foundation upon which a political solution could be developed. The second development was the meeting held in November between Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and Prime Minister Garret Fitzgerald of the Republic of Ireland. This too held great promise for it would have provided an important opportunity for these two leaders to discuss the gamut of political options including those put forth by the New Ireland Forum. The third development was the meeting held this past December 22 between President Reagan and Prime Minister Thatcher. I together with 59 of my colleagues in the House and Senate wrote to the President urging that Northern Ireland be placed on the agenda.

Notwithstanding these three important opportunities, there is little to show in the way of progress toward a political solution in Ulster. Perhaps the most damaging outcome was that involving the Thatcher-Fitzgerald meeting. It was here that Prime Minister Thatcher rejected in its entirety the New Ireland Forum and all of its proposals for the future of Ireland. This reinforces the position held by many that Britain and especially the Thatcher government has no interest in a political solution but remains obcessed with the idea of a military solution.

It is against this backdrop that I offer my resolution which has as its main motivation to advance a more positive United States role in the struggle for peace and justice in Northern Ireland. The resolution is quite explicit in that it calls on the President to first appoint a highly qualified independent and appropriately experienced special envoy to investigate and report how best the United States could actively assist all interested parties in Belfast, Dublin, and London as well as the communities in Northern Ireland to arrive at an early, just, and peaceful resolution of the present conflict in Northern Ireland.

In my judgment a special envoy would allow the United States to assume the role of an honest broker in Northern Ireland. The envoy would not seek to impose a solution on Northern Ireland but rather empower those with the capacity to achieve a lasting peaceful solution.

The special envoy proposal has wide support in the Irish American community of this Nation. One of the first to advance the proposal at the State level was Assemblyman John Dearie of the Bronx, NY, and as a result both the New York State Assembly and Senate passed a resolution calling for the designation of a special envoy for Northern Ireland. Leading Irish American organizations including the Ancient Order of Hibernians, the Irish National Caucus, and the Irish American Unity Conference have all endorsed the designation of a special envoy for Northern Ireland. The Democratic Party platform for 1984 contained language endorsing a special envoy.

I believe the time has come for the United States to work for peace in Northern Ireland. It is an American issue and does deserve our attention. I offer the special envoy resolution as one approach which I hope will get early and careful consideration by the House Foreign Affairs Committee.●

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1984

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, this concerns the Tax Reform Act of 1984 as adopted and its detrimental affect on veterans due to language contained therein restricting the issuance of tax exempt mortgage bonds. While I feel this action was unintentional it nevertheless poses a severe threat to the future of both the Texas Veterans Housing Assistance Program and the Texas Veterans Land Program unless repealed or modified.

This new tax legislation imposes limitations on just who can participate in the popular Veterans Housing Assistance Program. What this new bill means is that Texas veterans of World War II and the Korean war, plus any veteran who enlisted after January 1, 1977, including those who served in Grenada and Beirut, will no longer be eligible for home loans through the Veterans Housing Assistance Program.

The new law also abolishes the 35-year-old Texas Veterans Land Program in early 1987. This program begun in 1949 has over the years provided more than 85,000 veterans the means to purchase land, build new lives and realize the American dream.

Certainly I can appreciate that the Tax Reform Act of 1984 was passed to curtail abuses in the sale of tax exempt bonds. I do not, however, feel that our Veterans Land Program or our Veterans Housing Assistance Program constitute an abuse of tax exempt bonds.

That is why I am introducing legislation to address this dilemma, and I hope early action will be taken to remedy this problem.

Thank you.●

LEGISLATION TO CHANGE THE SIZE OF CITIES ELIGIBLE FOR LABOR SURPLUS AREA DESIGNATION

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to amend the Small Business Act to provide that cities as small as 25,000 population can qualify on their own for labor surplus area designation.

Currently, only cities over 50,000 population with high unemployment rates, and counties with high unemployment rates can qualify for this designation. What this means is that cities over 50,000 population, which tend to have the higher unemployment rates, are separated from the rest of the small cities, suburbs, and rural areas of a county, leaving the balance of some counties with unemployment rates so low that they cannot qualify for designation. This can end up hurting a small but distressed city, as it has in my district, where a city, Barberton, of 30,000 population with an estimated 18-percent unemployment rate, must be lumped in with more prosperous small cities and suburbs, thus currently disqualifying the distressed city.

The latest annual listing of labor surplus areas was published in September and it is clear that many distressed, smaller cities continue to be hurt by the lack of targeting in the eligibility regulations. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to consider the need for revision in this program.●

CHILD CARE

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, nearly a year ago, I introduced a resolution to establish a child care facility for Members of Congress and House employees. One hundred and eleven of my colleagues cosponsored this important resolution. In addition it sparked the interest of more than 400 House employees. This overwhelming enthusiasm showed me how important a child care facility would be in the House of Representatives.

Most working parents are faced with the dilemma of finding quality care for their children. The issue becomes particularly sensitive before children enter school. Parents want quality, educationally enriching programs at an affordable price. Distance and travel time to and from work become considerations parents must also face. Unfortunately, the options are limited and many parents find that they cannot provide care for their children during the day. It is estimated that at least 11 million children are left alone during the day when their parents are at work. To me, that is a national tragedy.

While the natural and most convenient location for a child care center would be the workplace, many private companies have been fearful of starting onsite child care for their employees. Some are reluctant to become involved with a family issue and view the risks involved in establishing a center as too great. Conversely, employees with young children find that employers' apprehensions are far outweighed by the many problems associated with parenting and working full time.

The resolution I am introducing today neither disrupts the family unit nor creates risks for the Government. It does respond to the needs of our colleagues and employees by establishing a selfsupporting, onsite child care facility. The child care center would be run by parents and interested employees through an advisory council under the direction of the Committee on House Administration. An initial startup fee would be allocated from House funds to pay for equipment. All other operating expenses would be assumed by the parents who use the center.

The House child care center is an example to other employers in the Nation. Like the child care centers operating in the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, Housing, and Education, and in the U.S. Senate, the House child care center will be a working model for companies who may be contemplating a similar program.

I have a commitment from Chairman JONES of the Services Subcommittee of House Administration, that the resolution will be taken up early in the year. I look forward to bipartisan support for this resolution and encourage my colleagues to cosponsor it. Thank you.●

HATCH ACT REFORM FOR POSTAL EMPLOYEES

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced the Postal Employees' Political Activities Act of 1985 which reforms the Hatch Act by permitting postal employees to participate voluntarily in political activities so long as those activities do not even appear to compromise the integrity of the Postal Service. At the same time the bill protects the public against improper political activities and solicitations, coercion, and protects postal employees against voluntary political activities.

The Hatch Act was enacted precipitously in 1939. It was an overreaction to coercion of and kickbacks by Federal employees and public assistance recipients. As presently written, the law is vague, overly broad, and consists of a patchwork of over 3,000 administrative rulings, most of which are not understood by either the public or postal employees.

My bill differentiates between voluntary and involuntary political activities. It protects the public interest while providing postal employees with greater freedom to participate in the political process.

In summary, the bill:

States that postal employees are encouraged to exercise their right of voluntary political participation.

Prohibits the use of official authority, influence, or coercion with respect to the right to vote, not to vote, or to otherwise engage in political activity.

Prohibits solicitation of political contributions by superior officials and making or soliciting political contributions in Government rooms or buildings.

Prohibits, with certain limited exception, political activity while on official duty, in Federal buildings, or in uniform.

Requires that employees who seek elective office do so on their own time, and that employees shall, upon request, be granted accrued annual leave or leave without pay to seek elective office.

Designates the special counsel of the Merit System Protection Board [MSPB] as the enforcing authority and the MSPB as the adjudicatory authority.

Subjects violators of law to removal, suspension, or lesser penalties at the discretion of the MSPB; requires a minimum of 30 days suspension without pay for any employee found guilty of violating the prohibition against use of official authority or influence for political purposes.

Requires the U.S Postal Service to report annually to the Congress on its implementation of this act.

The Postal Service system is a quasi-autonomous public corporation. Postal employees are in a different category from Federal employees. The postal worker's role, as an employee of a semi-independent agency, and the role of a Federal civilian employee, as an employee of the Government, make these two groups of employees separate and distinct. Unfortunately, the issue of full political participation for postal and Federal employees has been confused, notwithstanding their different status, so that they are treated as one and the same.●

AMENDING THE HOBBS ACT

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to amend the Hobbs Act, the Federal criminal statute which prohibits interference with commerce through threats or violence. The purpose of this bill is to clarify the use of the term "extortion." This clarification will prevent unfair judicial interpretations of the act in its application to labor strike interferences.

Since the Supreme Court's decision in United States against Enmons (1973) union officials are the only U.S. citizens immune from Federal prosecution under the Hobbs Act, the 1946 statute that makes extortion involving interstate commerce a Federal crime. This exemption created a legal loophole that has given union officials a powerful scepter of violence—violence against both employers and individual workers. It opened the way for union officials to use whatever violent means they think necessary to ensure that rank and file members obey the dictates of union hierarchy. Since 1975, public records show over 3,350 separate cases of union-inspired violence. The pervasiveness of this compulsory union violence further underscores the need for evenhanded Federal jurisdiction.

My bill will amend the Hobbs Act to restore equity, making sure that labor violence is treated no differently than any other violence falling within the Federal realm. It will eliminate the special exemption now enjoyed by labor, clarifying congressional intent so that the law cannot be again misinterpreted by the courts.●

NAZI WAR VICTIMS—CLAIMS AGAINST EAST GERMANY

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, under the leadership of our former colleague, Jonathan Bingham, the 94th Congress enacted legislation, Public Law 94-542, to provide for the settlement of claims against East Germany for the wrongful taking of property due to the racial and religious persecution by the Nazi regime before and during World War II.

It later became apparent that a large number of persons were unable to successfully make claims against the East German Government under Public Law 94-542 because of a decision made by East Germany in 1951.

Under Public Law 94-542, claims could be presented by persons who were U.S. nationals at the time of the loss of their property. The German Government decreed the "time of loss" to be September 6, 1951 and the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission followed this 1951 date when making its determinations. However, many of the victims of Nazi persecution living in the United States were not yet U.S. citizens as of September 6, 1951, although most became citizens by the time Public Law 94-542 was enacted, or by 1974, when the United States recognized the German Democratic Republic. Thus, these permanent U.S. residents who fled the Nazi horrors were denied their rights to compensation because their citizenship had not yet been attained.

Legal redress from the East German Government was denied these people because they were no longer residents of East Germany in 1951. Thus, because of action by the East German Government, and the language of Public Law 94-542, many of these claims have either not been submitted, or denied by the Commission.

To remedy this situation, I am introducing legislation which would allow the filing and consideration of claims against the East German Government by any person who was a permanent U.S. resident as of September 6, 1951, and who had become a U.S. citizen by the date of enactment of Public Law 94-542—September 4, 1974. Based upon this changed definition, it would be necessary for the Commission to reopen the filing period for claims against the East German Government. This is also provided for in the legislation.

We cannot restore the lives or well-being of the millions of people who suffered the outrages and inhumanity of the Nazi regime. However, we must do what we can to remove the roadblocks preventing those victimized by Nazi oppresssion from receiving compensation due them. It is for these reasons that I urge you to join me in cosponsoring this legislation.

H.R. 228

A bill to amend title VI of the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949 (relating to claims of nationals of the United States against the German Democratic Republic) to permit the determination of claims of persons who were aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States as of the date of loss and by September 4, 1974, citizens of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "International Claims Settlement Act Amendments of 1983".

SEC. 2. Section 601(1) of the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949 (22 U.S.C. 1644a(1)) is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (a) after "United States" by inserting "or who is an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States and by September 4, 1974, a citizen of the United States";

(2) in subparagraph (b) by striking out "natural persons who are citizens of the United States" and inserting in lieu thereof "persons described in subparagaph (a)"; and

(3) by striking out the last sentence.

SEC. 3. Section 602 of the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949 (22 U.S.C. 1644b) is amended—

(1) in the first sentence after "claims by nationals of the United States" by inserting "who were ineligible to have their claims considered by the Commission prior to the enactment of the International Claims Settlement Act Amendments of 1983"; and

(2) in the second sentence by striking out "this title" and inserting in lieu thereof "the International Claims Settlement Act Amendments of 1983".

SEC. 4. Section 609 of the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949 (22 U.S.C. 1644i) is amended after "date for filing of" by inserting "those"●

VETERANS' HOSPITAL IN SOUTH TEXAS

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, today, along with my colleague, SOLOMON P. ORTIZ, I am introducing legislation to establish a veterans' hospital in south Texas. I am initiating this action to meet the needs of approximately 100,000 veterans residing in our two districts as well as the influx of winter Texans throughout south Texas from around the Nation.

This is an endeavor I have been actively pursuing—first having introduced such legislation back in 1965, my first term. At that time, the estimated construction cost per hospital bed was $26,000. Today it is approximately $275,000. Had construction been authorized at that time, we would be way ahead of where we are now in treating the needs of veterans.

Over the years, this need has only increased. These men and women who have so valiantly served our country are deserving of a facility in south Texas now—today—which can adequately, comprehensively, and conveniently meet the needs. That is why it is so important to see this goal realized.

For me, this veterans' hospital is a priority, and I intend to work to see this goal become a reality. Our veterans have already paid the price for this legislation and, in return, it is our obligation to see to it that their needs are met.●

REFORM THE PRICE-ANDERSON ACT

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation that will enhance the safety of the nuclear power industry in this country by reforming the Price-Anderson Act. First enacted in 1957 when the nuclear industry was in its infancy, the Price-Anderson Act placed a temporary $560 million limit on liability for accidents at nuclear powerplants or during the transportation of nuclear materials, regardless of the number of people injured or the severity of the injuries or property damage.

However, with only minor increases, this temporary limit is still on the books after 25 years of inflation, and despite the fact that the industry is now mature. If the Three Mile Island accident had been more serious, the Price-Anderson Act probably would have prevented many people from recovering more than a few pennies on the dollar for their damages. I believe that anyone who suffers injury from an accident at a nuclear powerplant or from the transportation of nuclear materials should be able to sue to recover their actual damages in full.

This bill is identical to legislation I introduced in the 98th Congress. It makes three simple but fundamental changes to the Price-Anderson Act:

It removes the current $615 million limitation on total liability for damages to the public caused by a nuclear accident;

It makes the nuclear industry strictly liable for the damages caused by all accidents regardless of severity. Injured persons would not have to prove negligence in the design, construction, or operation of a plant in order to receive compensation for any injuries they might sustain. This change would bring Federal law into line with most State tort law regarding ultrahazardous activities; and

It eliminates the current 20-year statute of limitations on recovering damages caused by a nuclear accident. Instead, it would permit injured persons to recover damages if they sue within 3 years after they discover, or reasonably could have discovered, their injuries.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is long overdue. The "temporary" limit on liability enacted as part of the Price-Anderson Act is still on the books even though the nuclear industry is no longer an untried infant but an experienced giant. The public policy goal of the Price-Anderson Act has been achieved, and the industry is now mature. It is time to repeal this artificial limit on liability and to allow the free market to work.

Probably the closest we have come to a serious failure of safety at a nuclear powerplant is the 1978 accident at Three Mile Island in Pennsylvania. Now, over 6 years after the accident, the costs of cleaning up the facility remain unknown, but without a doubt, they will exceed $1 billion. However, the Federal Insurance Administration has estimated that under a worst-case scenario, a core meltdown, property loss alone from Three Mile Island would have come to $17 billion. I would point out that this figure assumes no personal injuries would have been sustained and there would have been a complete and uneventful evacuation of the area around the plant, a likelihood that is remote. Seventeen billion dollars in potential damages is a far cry from the current limit of $615 million.

Anyone making a claim for property damage resulting from Three Mile Island under the scenario examined by the Federal Insurance Administration would receive only 3 cents for every dollar of damage claimed. That means a resident who lost a $100,000 home would only receive $3,000 in damages. Yet that resident would continue to be liable for mortgage payments, and would not receive any additional compensation for property loss under standard homeowners' insurance policies, because these policies specifically exclude coverage for nuclear accidents. So in the case of a serious accident at a nuclear powerplant or during the transportation of nuclear materials, average citizens might never be able to recover compensation for their damages.

So far, the nuclear industry has a better safety record than the chemical industry and the airline industry, both of which thrive without a protective limit on normal tort liability. There is little convincing evidence that the insurance industry could not provide coverage for nuclear powerplant and transportation accidents. Utilities now insure their property for around $1 billion. Since insurers are willing to insure the nuclear plant itself, it seems clear that there will also be a market for insuring against normal tort liabilities which could arise from a nuclear accident.

Let me stress that I am a supporter, not an opponent, of nuclear power. As a member of the committee that oversees the Nuclear Regulatory Commission's regulation of nuclear plant safety, I am concerned by the uneven degree of competence among the various utility companies and the all too frequent—though, so far, not catastrophic—failures of quality assurance and other programs which are designed to protect the health and safety of the public. I believe that my proposed legislation would greatly increase public confidence in the safety of the nuclear industry by causing the insurance industry to play a greater role in monitoring nuclear plant safety.

The enactment of this legislation would promote the safest possible operation of the nuclear powerplants and would encourage the development of a more uniformly aggressive safety consciousness in the industry, which is essential if nuclear power is to play its proper role in our Nation's energy future.●

OVERSEAS TEACHERS ACT OF 1985

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Overseas Teachers Act of 1985, a bill similar to one I introduced in the 98th Congress. This bill is a modest proposal to help ensure that we attract and retain superior teachers in the overseas school system in order to guarantee the finest possible education for the children of the members of our armed services and civilian employees serving abroad.

The Federal public schools are responsible for the education of 140,000 American children living abroad—they are the sons and daughters of our service women and men who contribute so much to the defense of our country, and who deserve nothing less than the best education for their children. It is important that our military families be able to stay together, with their children assured of a quality public education regardless of where they are stationed around the world.

Most of us would view the prospect of living in Japan, Okinawa, Korea, the Philippines, Italy, Panama, Bermuda, Norway, Germany, or Holland (to name but a few of the locations of the over 270 schools) with the excitement of children visiting Disneyland—faraway places with faraway names, castles, and knights of old.

In some of the countries, however, the realities of life are far less pleasant for our overseas personnel due to the high cost of living and modest salaries paid them. Many of the employees also encounter substandard housing, language difficulties, cultural adjustments, poor medical facilities, and less sophisticated communications systems. We sometimes forget that Americans have the world's highest standard of living.

Last September, I chaired a hearing of my subcommittee on compensation and employee benefits on legislation concerning the overseas school system that I introduced in the last Congress. From this hearing it became clear that there are problem areas where the Department of Defense could act administratively and those where legislation is required.

The most common complaint of career teachers in the overseas system is the denial of transfers. Most teachers would be willing to experience difficult living conditions for a year or two if they had reasonable expectations of moving to another less demanding assignment. The inadequate housing, nonpotable water, and crowded classrooms are more tolerable if the prospect of better surroundings and working conditions are foreseeable.

Mr. Speaker, my bill proposes that teachers be permitted to compete for vacancies in other locations on an annual basis, thus providing a healthy and reasonable movement within the system by those wishing to transfer.

Normally, teachers hired overseas with no travel or household benefits (such as military spouses) leave the program within a few years: there are several hundred locally hired teachers who have stayed (without benefits) in the system after their original tour. Prior to 1972, these teachers received by administrative action the same benefits as teachers hired stateside. This practice was ended in 1972. My bill requires that these teachers, after 1 year, receive the same benefits as teachers hired in the United States as long as they are of the caliber the system demands.

My bill also establishes a basic school year which is the average length of the school jurisdictions in the United States used to determine overseas salaries, a school day of 7 hours and standard class sizes—all measures long overdue.

Mr. Speaker, presently, teachers in the overseas system are paid on the basis of a survey of school jurisdictions of 100,000 or more population conducted annually by the Department of Defense. Aligning teachers' pay to school jurisdictions of 100,000 or more students as my bill does, will reflect accurately the size of the overseas system and reduce the number of jurisdictions required to be surveyed from 170 to under 30.

Currently, teachers begin the school year in August receiving last year's pay pending completion and implementation of the survey which does not now occur until the following June. Besides the savings in time and money to the Government resulting from an abbreviated survey, it is also hoped that teachers would receive their proper salary during the school year.

This bill permits a 1-year sabbatical to be given to upgrade the skills of teachers after 7 years in the system; provides for maximum household shipment as allowed for by statute, and requires that if, because of Government delay, teachers arrive overseas after the start of the school year, they be paid as if they had started the school year on time.

The most innovative section of this bill, however, provides a long-needed career ladder for teachers. Over the past several years, there has been an increased emphasis on excellence in education. An analysis of various reports on the state of education in this country leads to one inescapable conclusion—all things being equal, teachers make the difference.

Today, a teacher must leave the profession or become an administrator in the system to move up the financial ladder. My proposal establishes five pay levels, based on service in the system. I have invited suggestions from the Department of Defense, and especially the Department of Education, concerning additional qualifications and duties for each level consistent with the basic premise that the teacher remain primarily in the classroom.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, over 80 percent or our overseas teachers are women; it is fitting that the Federal Government recognize the true worth of the teaching profession by establishing within that profession the means to attain reasonable financial rewards consistent with the contribution teachers make to our society.

We ask so much of our armed service members and their families: They suffer frequent dislocations and family separations. They are the true servants of the public—volunteers from every part of America dedicated to the freedom of our great republic. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation to help ensure that their children continue to have the best public school education possible.●

FEDERAL FIREFIGHTERS' WORKWEEK

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would eliminate a glaring inequity in the treatment of Federal firefighters by reducing the regularly scheduled Federal firefighter workweek from 72 to 56 hours. The bill also authorizes the payment of 25 percent premium pay and overtime pay for any hours in excess of the 56-hour workweek.

Federal firefighters currently work a scheduled 72-hour workweek. They are paid salaries comparable to most municipal firefighters who work an average 54 hours weekly. The Fair Labor Standards Act extends special overtime pay provisions to all fire and police personnel, including Federal firefighters. It mandates payment for all hours in excess of 54 hours per week. But, under a decision of the Comptroller General, Federal firefighters receive only one-half time, not time and one-half, for each of the 18 hours of overtime they are required to work each week.

The rationale for this payment scheme was that since Federal firefighters receive regular pay, which includes 25 percent premium pay, for each of the 72 hours they work, they are only entitled to receive one-half time their regular rate of pay for the 18 overtime hours. What this has meant to the average Federal firefighter—GS-5, step 4—is the payment of approximately $1.85 per hour for 18 hours of overtime. As a result, the Federal service has experienced difficulties in retaining high quality personnel, with many firefighters leaving to work for municipal fire departments.

Recognizing the inequity of the 72-hour workweek, the 95th Congress passed an identical bill, H.R. 3161, with wide bipartisan support in both the House and Senate. However, the President vetoed the bill on the basis of arguments set forth by the Civil Service Commission during the consideration of the bill. Those arguments were rejected by both the House and Senate Civil Service Committees.

The first objection to the bill was that the legislation did not reduce premium pay for Federal firefighters; that premium pay should be reduced when hours are reduced. This argument was based on a faulty interpretation of premium pay provisions.

Under existing law, Federal employees who regularly perform substantial amounts of standby duty beyond a normal tour of duty are entitled to receive additional compensation in lieu of overtime, night differential, Sunday and holiday pay. It is a percentage, not to exceed 25 percent of an employee's base pay. The actual percentage of premium pay which an employee receives is fixed by the Office of Personnel Management on the basis of overtime, nights, Sundays, and holidays worked. The 56-hour workweek would meet each of the criteria for full premium pay, and is therefore justified under current law.

The second major objection to the legislation was that it would impair the ability of the heads of Federal agencies to manage the work force. However, no provision of the vetoed bill would have had this effect. The legislation simply said that:

> The regularly scheduled administrative workweek of Federal firefighters shall be an average of 56 hours per week, computed on the basis of a period of 21 consecutive days.

It provided that:

> The duration and frequency of work shifts occurring within such period shall be determined under regulations prescribed by Civil Service Commission.

This provision would fully permit agency heads to manage Federal firefighters.

The third and final objection to the House- and Senate-passed bill was that the Department of Defense would be required to hire 4,600 new Federal firefighters at an annual cost of $46.7 million. Defense Department estimates were rejected by both the House and Senate, in light of Congressional Budget Office estimates that only 2,200 new Federal firefighters would be needed if the 72-hour workweek were reduced, at a cost of $24.3 million.

Throughout consideration of the vetoed bill, the reduced Federal firefighter workweek, along with the continuation of 25 percent premium pay, was regularly characterized as some sort of windfall by the bill's opponents. The provisons of H.R. 3161 would have decreased the average Federal firefighter's weekly paycheck by approximately 9 percent. Furthermore, comparisons between Federal firefighter locals and corresponding municipal locals revealed that municipal firefighters earned at least $500 more per year for an average 54-hour workweek, with Federal firefighters working 33 percent more hours per week. Under these circumstances, the depiction of this bill as a windfall for Federal firefighters was and remains unwarranted.

Federal firefighters continue to be treated unfairly by the Federal Government in terms of work hours and compensation. I have therefore introduced this bill, and expect both the House and Senate to lend their support once again, so that this unfair treatment of Federal firefighters may finally be rectified.●

MAKING ANTITRUST LAWS APPLICABLE TO LABOR UNIONS

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to amend our antitrust laws so as to make them fully applicable to labor unions in the same manner as they apply to business enterprises. My bill would do this by striking the exemptions for labor unions from the Clayton, Sherman, Taft-Hartley, and Norris-LaGuardia Acts.

The immunity from Federal antitrust laws enjoyed by labor is having an increasingly adverse impact on the Nation's economy. Under protective cover of the law, unions are able to engage in price fixing, product control, market control, featherbedding, and many other monopolistic, countercompetitive practices when done by owners and managers are outlawed under the Sherman Act.

America's workers should retain the right to bargain collectively with their employers in matters of wages, hours, or working conditions, and to strike, if necessary, to give substance to this right. However, this legislation is necessary to insure that these rights are not abused in such a way to establish monopolies and restrain free trade.

No doubt union officials will attack the intent of this legislation and will endeavor to portray it as harsh and punitive. Yet there is no good reason for special treatment of labor unions. Union monopoly should not be allowed to exist any more than corporate monopoly. I urge my colleagues to support me in this endeavor by joining me as a cosponsor.●

NORMALIZATION OF RELATIONS WITH CUBA

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today legislation to end the U.S. trade embargo against Cuba and to establish full diplomatic relations between our two nations.

Our current Cuba policy was instituted more than 20 years ago to isolate and destabilize the government of Fidel Castro. In the cold war atmosphere of the early sixties, we broke off diplomatic relations with the island republic and imposed a trade embargo in concert with the Organization of American States.

In the intervening years, however, this effort to isolate Cuba has failed. The embargo has not destabilized the Castro regime. It has not weakened ties between Moscow and Havana. And it has not produced any apparent modifications in Cuban foreign policy.

Even our allies in the Western Hemisphere have ignored the economic ban on Cuba. In 1975 the Organization of American States informally lifted the ban, allowing its member states to normalize relations with Cuba. Eleven nations in the Western Hemisphere now have full ties with Cuba. In addition, Canada, Japan, and many Western European nations enjoy a steady trade with the island. Japanese exports alone now total more than $500 million a year.

On balance, our nonrecognition policy has done more harm than good to our international interests. The embargo has hardened Cuban resentment against the United States and has driven Castro more firmly into the embrace of the Soviet Union. Our economic denial of Cuba has really amounted to self-denial, cutting off a major market for American manufactured goods. With Cuba only 90 miles from our shores, most of its great need for buses, railroad cars, heavy machinery, and agricultural implements could be supplied by us. Instead, Cuba has looked elsewhere—not only to the Communist countries, but to Great Britain, France, and Japan.

The economic blockade of the past two decades has failed to cut off Cuba from the rest of the world. It has only cut us off from Cuba.

Positive steps in United States-Cuban relations have been recently made. On December 14 of last year, representatives of the United States and Cuba signed an agreement whereby Cuba will permit the repatriation of more than 2,700 undesirables from U.S. jails and mental institutions. In return the United States will resume its traditional practice of admitting Cuban political prisoners as well as permitting qualified Cubans to emigrate to this country.

The successful dialog on immigration, which ends a 4-year disagreement that began with the Mariel boatlift of 1980, could lead to fruitful discussions on free travel, cultural exchanges, and the resumption of economic and diplomatic relations. There remain sharp differences between the United States and Cuba. But if one thing is clear above all else, it is that we will not be able to address these questions in the absence of real progress toward normalized relations.

After many years, and over difficult obstacles, we have made that adjustment with the People's Republic of China. The process of normalization between the United States and China offers good reason to believe that the issue of expropriations and restitution can be resolved between the Cuban Government and ours. A formula for settling claims was devised after Washington and Peking restored full relations. A similar agreement could be reached with Cuba.

Differing economic systems and world views have not prevented the United States from exchanging envoys and establishing trade links with the Soviet Union, China, and many Eastern European nations. The time has come to deal on the same basis in our own hemisphere.

A copy of the legislation follows:

A bill to remove certain trade restrictions with respect to Cuba and to otherwise provide for improved relations with Cuba

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 620(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2370(a)) is repealed. Upon the enactment of this Act—

(1) Presidential Proclamation 3447 (February 3, 1962) shall cease to be effective;

(2) Cuba shall cease to be included in Country Group Z for purposes of the Export Administration Regulations (15 C.F.R. 368-399);

(3) the Cuban Assets Control Regulations (31 C.F.R. 515) shall cease to be effective; and

(4) any other regulations issued to carry out section 620(a) or Presidential Proclamation 3447, or to otherwise maintain an embargo on trade between the United States and Cuba, shall cease to be effective.

SEC. 2. Public Law 87-733 (76 Stat. 697), approved October 3, 1962, is repealed. That portion of the paragraph under the heading "Caribbean Basin Initiative" in Public Law 97-257 which follows the first sentence is repealed. Section 1543 of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1985, is repealed.●

REFUNDABLE INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing legislation I have introduced in every Congress since the mid-1970's. This legislation, the Refundable Investment Tax Credit Act, would correct a serious inequity in our current tax policy.

The investment tax credit has been a major policy tool for stimulating economic growth since its inception in the early 1960's. Under current law, however, this tax credit is available only to firms with tax liability, either currently or in the past 3 years. The credit can also be used to offset any tax liability which arises in the next 15 years.

While these restrictions are reasonable, they result in an unanticipated and serious disparity in the marketplace. They generate considerable doubt among some companies as to whether they will benefit from the full credit. And the later the credit is received, the less it is worth in terms of today's dollar. Worse, two firms in the same industry may face very different after-tax costs for purchasing the same equipment, with the profitable firms, which have less need for the credit, paying a lower effective price for the equipment.

The current restrictions hit small firms, new firms, rapidly growing firms, and firms suffering from a general economic decline most unfairly. New firms usually do not incur any tax liability for the first few years they are in business since their revenues are low, but the only way they can increase revenues is to make significant investments, frequently in assets which qualify for the investment tax credit, but which they may not be able to claim fully.

The bill I am again introducing would end these uncertainties and unintended inequities by making the investment tax credit refundable. Under my proposal, the credit would be available to all firms regardless of size or tax liability. The firm would be eligible for a refund from the Treasury for the differences between the credit and the firm's tax liability for the year. Refundability ensures the maximum economic stimulus during the time when such stimulus is needed most directly.

Refundability was endorsed by both the Carter and Ford administrations. The Reagan administration attempted to effect a back-door refundability through its disastrous fiasco known as tax-leasing, which has since been essentially repealed. I strongly supported the repeal of tax leasing since it was nothing more than a tax dodge for profitable corporations and did nothing to target economic stimulus to companies in need. The Treasury Department's tax reform proposal which the President is now considering proposes the repeal of the investment tax credit on the grounds that "the current ITC discriminates against new businesses and companies with losses." That's precisely the reason for my bill, which would eliminate the problem while retaining the beneficial stimulus associated with the credit. I urge enactment of my bill.●

INTRODUCING MEMORIAL TO HONOR WOMEN IN ARMED FORCES

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a resolution which would authorize the establishment of a memorial to honor the thousands of women who have served in our Armed Forces.

Although our traditional view of women serving in the Armed Forces is depicted with nurses tending to injured soldiers, women have served in a variety of military occupations as early as the American revolution. Dr. Linda De Pauw, professor of history at George Washington University, has written a number of articles on the great contributions women have made in the Armed Forces. She has documented the fact that more than 20,000 women served in artillery units in the Continental Army.

Women also experienced combat action in the Civil War, as the most famous female soldier of that time, Sarah Edwards, disregarded the customary social mores of the 19th century and served as a spy, courier, nurse, and soldier for the Union Army. Clara Burton also made her valued mark in history tending to the sick and wounded. Barton went on to establish both the National Cemetery and the Red Cross.

The urgency of defending our country during World War II gave women broader opportunities in the armed services. From Rosie the riveter to the first women to serve in the WAC's and WAF's in 1942, women proved their bravery and dedication to our country. Cornelia Fort was the first American woman pilot to die during war duty. Shortly before her bomber crashed, she wrote her feelings about serving in the Armed Forces.

None of us can put into words why we fly • • • I know it in dignity, self-sufficiency, and pride of skill. I know it in the satisfaction of usefulness.

Mr. Speaker, Cornelia Fort's words epitomize the feelings that so many women had in defending our Nation. I believe it is only fitting that a memorial be erected to preserve their patriotism and glory.

Thank you.●

DOING BUSINESS IN OUTER SPACE

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, November 28, 1984 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

DOING BUSINESS IN OUTER SPACE

With much of the recent presidential debate focussed on the military uses of outer space, it is important not to overlook the civilian uses. The present-day civilian uses of outer space are many, ranging from the proper management of weather satellites to scientific missions that study the distant reaches of the universe. However, the use with perhaps the greatest potential is commercialization—using outer space for a wide variety of manufacturing and industrial research, first on the space shuttle, next on the permanent manned space station projected for 1992, and then in private orbiting laboratories and factories.

Those who know say that this is no comic-book fantasy. Past commercial uses of outer space, such as putting communications satellites into orbit, will be small-scale operations, we are told, when compared to the vast operations in which we will engage when we begin making things in outer space. One product made aboard the space shuttle—an incredibly tiny latex sphere to be used in comparing the sizes of objects being viewed under a microscope—has already been placed on sale by the National Bureau of Standards. A major pharmaceutical company has produced an extremely pure hormone in outer space, which it hopes to have on the market by 1987. This is only the beginning. One study has forecast that commercial undertakings in outer space could yield up to $65 billion in annual sales within 15 years.

Outer space offers a combination of key working conditions difficult or impossible to reproduce on Earth. It is a sterile environment characterized by a near-perfect vacuum, unfiltered sunlight, and virtual weightlessness. Yet there are problems. Commercial projects that could be done on the space shuttle must be completed in less than 10 days, with compact equipment and limited power. The enormous cost of making things in outer space means that the resulting products must fetch prices somewhere between $100,000 and $1 million per kilogram, a fact which confines the field largely to pharmaceutical and electronics manufacturing.

Aggressive high-technology companies are forging ahead despite the problems. By the mid-1990's, pharmaceutical firms may be involved in micro-gravity production of valuable medicines for diabetics and cancer patients. The electronics industry may be revolutionized by manufacturing in outer space, initially because of the chance to grow pure crystals of gallium arsenide which have much greater capabilities than today's silicon chips, and eventually through the availability of a whole new generation of processed glasses. In addition, other types of companies are starting to view outer space as an important laboratory, if not a place to build factories. For example, a farm implement manufacturer hopes that research in outer space will teach it how to make cheaper and stronger iron castings.

The United States is not the only country showing an interest in the commercialization of outer space. While we have developed most of the fundamental space technology, the Japanese and Europeans, working in close government-industry partnerships, are pursuing commercialization vigorously. They are expanding their launching capabilities and designing free-flying space platforms, as well as utilizing our space shuttle for the development of advanced technology of their own. Many experts fear that outer space may be another area where American science pioneered the basics, only to see foreign business reap the profits.

Luckily, the United States is not standing idly by as other nations take bold and lucrative risks in outer space. We are doing many things to improve our program of commercialization. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), the White House, and Congress all are getting involved.

At the urging of Congress, NASA is taking several steps to lure American industry into outer space. It has established a formal office of commercialization within the agency. It offers free rides on the space shuttle under certain conditions so that private-sector scientists may test the feasibility of different programs of research and development, and it will permit participating firms to keep patent rights. More NASA money is being directed toward the research that industry thinks will do the most to help commercialize outer space. Also, the agency is using consultants with strong business ties to drum up interest in outer space among executives, and it plans to offer seed money to companies to pay some of the start-up costs if they decide to try doing business in outer space.

Congress and the White House are looking at many other initiatives that will assist in the commercialization of outer space. A key step was the recent decision to begin to provide funding for a permanent manned space station. Also, a National Commission on Space was set up to generate national goals in space policy. Another new law cuts through red tape that hinders the private launching of space vehicles, and some anti-trust restrictions have been eased so that consortiums can get into space research and development. Congress is considering legislation to expand relevant tax incentives—for example, making space projects eligible for the 10% investment tax credit, making space equipment eligible for accelerated depreciation, and easing access to the 25% development tax credit for firms doing business in outer space—and it is looking into new tax incentives for the space industry. Also, Congress has eased unintended regulatory barriers to space industry by revising the law so that products made in outer space by American companies on American spacecraft are not considered imports when the products are brought back to Earth. The White House is trying to insure that foreign markets are open to American space firms to the same extent that American markets are open to foreign space firms.

With proper federal encouragement, outer space could become one of the more exciting areas of technological growth and development for the remainder of the century.●

THE MILK PROTEIN FAIR TRADE ACT

HON. TOBY ROTH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation to impose a quota on casein imports into the United States.

These imports interfere significantly with the success of the dairy price support program by displacing our own supplies of nonfat dry milk. At a time when we seek to decrease both Federal expenditures in the farm bill and surpluses of dairy products, we can save Federal funds by curtailing casein.

In 1983, 159.5 million pounds of imported casein displaced approximately 400 million pounds of nonfat dry milk. The Federal Government then had to purchase this product as dairy surplus.

Countries of the European Community account for a large portion of our casein imports. The EC subsidizes its casein production and disposes of its excess products in the United States. What we are experiencing, Mr. Speaker, is a situation in which the American taxpayer is paying twice for the same commodity. We are paying the EC to subsidize casein production by allowing it to export so generously to the United States its surpluses. Simultaneously, we are buying our own nonfat dry milk which has been displaced by casein imports. This is an intolerable use of American tax dollars.

The quota to be imposed would be 50 percent of the average of yearly imports of casein to the United States during the period of January 1, 1979 to December 31, 1983. Under section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the President would have authority to review and change the quota as conditions dictate in the future.

Today, the evidence is clear that casein imports interfere directly with the dairy price support program. Milk protein product imports have shifted in use from industrial application to food and feed products. In its report, "US Casein and Lactalbumin Imports: An Economic and Policy Perspective," the Department of Agriculture concluded that 53 percent of the casein used in the United States in 1980 was used in products for which domestic milk solids could be used.

In 1935, the Congress enacted section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which provided for the orderly imposition of quotas on imported products determined to interfere with domestic agriculture policy.

A 50-percent limitation on casein imports would not restrict availability for uses for which there is no available substitute or for which domestic milk or milk products would not be used.

Should casein imports continue unchecked, we will see rapid increases in the cost of the dairy price support program to taxpayers, increases which all of my colleagues, be they from dairy regions or urban areas, are trying to avoid. It is imperative that we consider casein restrictions not simply as a trade issue, but as an important agricultural issue.

We have at our command legislation that allows us to ensure that our dairy price support program can operate in the best interests of the taxpayer, the farmer and the consumer. We also have conclusive evidence that we must employ these provisions of that law to protect our domestic policy from unwarranted interference by the rapidly expanding influence of casein imports.

It is incumbent upon the Congress to act to curtail the counterproductive import of casein and I urge my colleagues to support my legislation to accomplish this goal. This is an issue of fair treatment for America's dairy farmer. By enacting this legislation we will both reduce the cost to the taxpayer of the dairy price support program and decrease the surplus of domestic dairy products.●

CONGRESS SUPPORTS THE SECOND AMENDMENT RIGHT

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution, to reaffirm that the sense of Congress supports the second amendment right to the Constitution of the United States. This is an effort by many of our colleagues and the Citizens Committee for the Right to Keep and Bear Arms to insure that our Founding Father's intentions on the second amendment remains intact.

The second amendment states:

A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

There are few issues in this country that are more emotional or less understood than an individual's right to keep and bear arms, and it is disheartening to see any erosion of these rights when the framers of our Constitution clearly intended to guarantee an individual's freedom to protect himself. Certainly we have better things to do with our money, particularly in these times, than to spend it depriving people of their right to protect themselves, denying them the right to use a gun for hunting or target shooting and invading their privacy.

We simply must reject any attempts to restrict American citizens from defending themselves and their property as this is a severe threat to one of our basic freedoms as citizens of the United States. Currently police protection is guaranteed only in broad terms. There is nothing in the law that guarantees personal protection to any particular person. Since the U.S. criminal justice system has not demonstrated the ability to provide adequate public safety, we simply cannot in all good conscience prevent individuals from protecting themselves.

Gun control advocates believe that taking away everybody's guns will reduce crime. I will agree that if everybody's guns were confiscated crime might go down, just as it would if all knives were confiscated. But, getting "everybody" to turn in his gun is the problem. If criminals are willing to break the law by using a gun on someone else, they certainly are not going to turn it in—especially if they want to use it again. If we deny anyone his second amendment rights, we will only be creating a bigger blackmarket. Furthermore, if people cannot protect themselves, there will be an increase rather than a decrease in crime. Take away from the law-abiding citizen his right to that protection and the criminals will have a heyday. Moreover, our law enforcement agencies would be so busy checking up on guns they would have little time to do much about it.

To reiterate, my bill is to affirm our Nation's belief in our second amendment right to keep and bear arms. I welcome my colleagues to join me in my support of this constitutional right by cosponsoring my legislation.●

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1985

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing legislation to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in housing, employment, education, and public facilities.

A person's sexual orientation should not be considered as legitimate grounds for bias, any more than skin color or religious expression. Moreover, as these fundamental rights are undermined whenever an individual's sexual orientation is used as the basis for discrimination, this legislation will reinforce the constitutional guarantee of the right to privacy.

Homosexual men and women are in every occupation and institution in our Nation. They are doctors, lawyers, professors, writers, government workers, and streetsweepers. They are rich and poor, black and white, city dwellers, and rural residents. There are an estimated 20 million homosexual men and women in the United States, and like most Americans, they obey the law and work hard.

But unlike other minority groups, homosexuals do not have legal recourse when they encounter discrimination. A man or woman may meet every possible criterion for housing or employment and yet if he or she is a homosexual, an apartment or job can be denied him or her simply on the basis of personal, private sexual orientation.

Many organizations, representing a cross-section of America, strongly support civil rights protections for gays. These include the American Psychiatric Association, the National Council of Churches, and the National Organization for Women [NOW], Lutheran Church in America, the United Church of Christ, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the Episcopal Church, United Presbyterian Church, the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees [AFSCME], the Service Employees International Union [SEIU], the International Ladies, Garment Workers, Union [ILGWU], the AFL-CIO, and the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

I believe that the majority of Americans oppose this form of bias just as strongly as they reject discrimination directed against racial and religious minorities. There is no less compelling a need to protect the ability of homosexuals to enjoy basic opportunities. Like all Americans, they deserve the full and equal protection of the law.

I want to urge my colleagues to join me and the original cosponsors of this legislation, Mr. WAXMAN, Mr. ACKER-MAN, Mr. AUCOIN, Mr. BARNES, Mr. BERMAN, Mrs. BOXER, Mr. BROWN of California, Mrs. BURTON of California, Mrs. COLLINS, Mr. CONYERS, Mr. COYNE, Mr. CROCKETT, Mr. DELLUMS, Mr. DIXON, Mr. DYMALLY, Mr. EDGAR, Mr. FAUNTROY, Mr. FOGLIETTA, Mr. FRANK, Mr. GREEN, Mr. HAYES, Mr. HOYER, Mr. LELAND, Mr. LEVINE, Mr. LOWRY of Washington, Mr. MARKEY, Mr. MARTINEZ, Mr. MATSUI, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. MILLER of California, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. MOODY, Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut, Mr. OWENS, Mr. SABO, Mrs. SCHROEDER, Mr. SCHUMER, Mr. SOLARZ, Mr. STARK, Mr. STUDDS, Mr. TOWNS, Mr. UDALL, Mr. WEAVER, Mr. WHEAT, and Mr. YATES in supporting this effort to insure equal rights under the law.

A copy of the legislation follows:

A bill to prohibit discrimination on the basis of affectional or sexual orientation, and for other purposes

LEGISLATION TO NULLIFY THE REAGAN ADMINISTRATION'S WORLD COURT DECISION

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, on April 6, 1984, the Reagan administration announced that it would not accept the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice on any issue relating to Central America for 2 years. The administration's decision reduced the United States, a nation founded on the very principle of the rule of law, to the level of an international scofflaw. I am today reintroducing legislation I first introduced last year to declare the administration's action null and void.

The administration's declaration with respect to the nonjurisdiction of the World Court was clearly designed to deflect international criticism of the President's decision to authorize direct CIA involvement in the general campaign to destabilize and perhaps overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. But the declaration has not and cannot succeed in its goal of escaping responsibility. Rather, it simply reduces the credibility of the United States in the eyes of the law and the eyes of the international community. Worse yet, it abandons our historic commitment to the rule of law, which has been the very foundation of our Nation.

Even while preparing for the resumption of arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union, the administration continues to make public criticisms of the Soviet record on compliance with current arms control agreements. We are properly outraged by terrorists who violate the basic tenets of international civilized behavior by attacking innocent civilians and murdering American diplomats, and Secretary of State Shultz has urged a tough military response to such despicable acts. It is thus exceedingly ironic that the administration should so cavalierly decide that the United States is simply not going to accept World Court jurisdiction for 2 years. This decision was made notwithstanding the fact that such action would seem almost certainly to be in direct violation of the declaration of August 2, 1946, accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court, and requiring, with limited exceptions, 6 months, notice before the United States may terminate the existing declaration. Such notice has never been given.

Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration's determination to selectively disavow World Court jurisdiction is, in effect, saying that the United States will abide by this or that agreement or treaty so long as it pleases, but any time an agreement may prove a hindrance it will not abide by it or abide by it only selectively. This is a despicable act. How can the administration assert that our foes are violating agreements or international law and at the same time decide unilaterally that we will not only not abide by international law or agreements when to do so conflicts with administration policy, but will violate the procedures for terminating those agreements as we choose.

The action of the administration with regard to the World Court is unsound, ill-timed, and illegal. Less than a month ago, the Court ruled, with only the American judge dissenting, that the Nicaraguan case against the United States had a right to be heard. This is a sharp rebuke to the Reagan administration's efforts to block Court jurisdiction. If we are to avoid similar embarrassments in the months ahead, the administration's World Court declaration should be overturned. The legislation I am introducing today would achieve that goal by declaring that the action of the Secretary of State on April 6, 1984, in attempting to withdraw for 2 years the acceptance by the United States of the compulsory jurisdiction of the World Court, is null and void. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

EXPORT ADMINISTRATION AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to renew the Export Administration Act of 1979 which expired over a year ago. Without benefit of a congressional mandate, the President has had to resort to the International Economic Emergency Powers Act to monitor the destination and content of these shipments.

I can think of no more important business before this body than the expeditious consideration of the Export Administration Amendments Act of 1985. We have a responsibility to the business community to streamline a now lengthy and cumbersome system of export licensing controls. We have a responsibility to our Nation to safeguard our national security by preventing the diversion of militarily critical technologies to the Soviet bloc. We cannot forestall action on a new bill any longer.

The Congress spent the last year and a half considering the renewal of the Export Administration Act. We spent over 6 months and hundreds of hours painstakingly reviewing every section of the House and Senate bills. Many difficult issues were resolved through careful compromises.

The bill which I am introducing today reflects those compromises that were made in the waning hours of the 98th Congress. In my opinion, this bill strikes a balance between the twin objectives of abating the transfer of Western militarily critical technologies to the Soviet bloc and streamlining the export licensing process so as not to unduly handicap U.S. exporters.

On the one hand, extensive evidence demonstrates that diversion of high technology to the Soviet bloc is a serious problem and costs U.S. taxpayers millions of dollars in additional defense expenditures. The National Academy of Sciences estimates that diversion of critical Western technology to the Soviet bloc has enabled the Soviet military to develop countermeasures to Western weapons, improve Soviet weapon performance, avoid hundreds of millions of dollars in research and development costs, and modernize critical sectors of Soviet military production.

On the other hand, the present system of export licensing is seriously undermining the ability of our firms to be reliable suppliers for overseas buyers. Export licenses are required for too many nonsensitive items. Processing deadlines that we in the Congress mandated are consistently being ignored. It is taking an average of 83 days for our Government to process license applications reviewed by more than one agency! In some cases, these delays extend beyond 1 year.

The bill I am introducing today addresses these twin concerns. For example, a great deal of the high technology that is acquired by the Soviet bloc is through surreptitious diversion. Thus, this bill extends additional authority and funds to Customs enforcement officers for border and property searches. The success of our control efforts is heavily dependent on a multilateral approach and consensus. Therefore, this bill strengthens Cocom, the multinational body responsible for coordinating export control practices among the major Western nations. Penalties for violations of export control laws are strengthened. The responsibility within the U.S. Government for U.S. export controls is elevated to the Under Secretary level. These are all significant improvements aimed at stopping the flow of critical technology to the Soviet bloc.

Improvements for U.S. exporters are also made. For example, this bill eliminates the need for export licenses on low-technology items being sold to the major Western countries. It reduces processing deadlines requiring a 15-day turnaround on routine license applications. Agricultural commodities are excluded from national security controls. This bill requires the Commerce Department to set up an Office of Foreign Availability to ascertain what technologies are readily available from non-U.S. sources. We cannot expect our exporters to be constrained by export controls if a comparable technology can be readily procured from another source. Much greater constraints are placed on the excessive use of export controls for foreign policy purposes.

Business has a right to expect the Congress to set standards and criteria for exporting U.S. technology abroad and it behooves us to act now. With a $130 billion trade deficit growing everyday Congress must take steps to redress a deficient and cumbersome export licensing system.

The Constitution empowers the Congress with the responsibility to regulate commerce with foreign nations and to safeguard our national security. We have the opportunity to amend the now expired Export Administration Act early in the year using the compromises adopted in the waning hours of the last session. Attempts to make major new changes or to fine-tune the bill will only open a Pandora's box, condemning the bill's proponents and critics to endless debate. We as a nation cannot afford to delay this effort any longer. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

OBSERVATIONS ON THE 1984 ELECTION: PART II

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, November 21, 1984, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

OBSERVATIONS ON THE 1984 ELECTION—PART II

After another week of reflection on the 1984 campaign and election, I am struck by how little emphasis there was on the big questions that we should be asking ourselves: How do we achieve growth with stable prices and full employment? How do we prevent nuclear war? How do we protect the environment and improve our schools?

The presidential candidates had different approaches to the issues. Mr. Mondale waged a campaign "on the issues," spelling out in detail his views on such matters as the budget deficit and arms control. Whether Mr. Mondale was successful in presenting his point of view is open to question. For Mr. Reagan, the issues were secondary. He depended more on the themes of leadership and opportunity to communicate shared values and promote optimism among his audiences.

When the presidential candidates did address the issues, I noticed a certain convergence. Mr. Reagan's call for a bigger military budget was close to Mr. Mondale's suggested 4% to 5% annual increase. Mr. Reagan was not trying to dismantle social programs, and Mr. Mondale was not arguing for new ones. Both men pushed arms control and deficit reduction, but I suspect that their agreement was more apparent than real and was part of the chemistry of modern presidential contests in which each candidate moves to the center.

One other feature of the campaign stands out in my mind. The Republicans were much more united than the Democrats. They ran as a clearly defined party supporting their party platform and candidate for President. The Democrats were all over the lot and did not run as firm supporters of their party platform or presidential candidate.

In some respects, the election has a disquieting meaning for both parties. The Democrats were never able to shake the perception that they represent special interest groups, especially the minorities, the poor, and organized labor. Often, I ran into voters who said they did not want to go back to the politics that Mr. Mondale advocated. There clearly was much doubt about the Democrats' ability to lead the nation from the White House. The Democrats had better heed the message that the voters have consistently sent them by rejecting their candidate for President in four of the last five elections. Like other observers, however, I think that on many issues other than economic ones, including the environment, social justice, and arms control, the people generally supported the Democrats.

The Republicans did well, but they came away from the election with their own set of problems. They face a potential party-splitting leadership struggle in the post Reagan period, and they are perceived as the party of the affluent and the extreme religious right. They will have to govern a country that is less united after the election, a result partly due to a campaign marked by class, racial, and religious differences. Moreover, the budget deficit that they must confront will surely be a source of trouble for them. Yet another concern has to be the prevalence of ticket-splitting in the election, which may indicate that while the people like Mr. Reagan, they do not want to give him a free hand but prefer to have him secure approval for his proposals from an independent Congress. I understand why the Republicans want to savor their victory, but my sense is that their problems will permit them little time for celebration or rest.

Those of us from the Midwest must note with some concern that the election was the first in which a shift of political strength to the West and the South was visible. The Northeast and the Midwest lost 17 electoral votes, dropping to 250 from 267 in 1980. The South and the West gained the 17 and moved up to 288.

Many experts say that a basic realignment of the electorate is taking place. My view is this realignment does not necessarily favor any political party, but rather reflects both the very loose attachment that people have to political parties and the fluidity that now characterizes their voting. The voters have fewer roots in either political party.

One comment heard over and over again by me and other politicians was that our campaigns have become too long. By October, people were saying, "I'm ready to vote—let's get it over with." I myself will not be surprised if someone tells me that the 1988 presidential campaign began in earnest on Wednesday morning, November 7! On the positive side, it is safe to say that the voters do have ample time to make up their minds.

Some weeks before the election, I decided that the presidential contest was all over. The combination of a popular President with peace, prosperity, and patriotism left no doubt in my mind about the result. One voter summed it up for me in August when he said, "Somebody must be doing something right—I'll vote for Reagan."

Despite all the hoopla, it was the economy that provided the main impetus for Mr. Reagan's win. His accent on traditional values and his vision of the future were minor aspects of his success. Day after day the economic news did his work for him: inflation down, interest rates falling, employment up. In a sense, the "Great Communicator" did not even have to communicate.

I think that Mr. Reagan won because he is where the country is on the big issues. His personality was an asset, but his appeal to the voters was based primarily on the fact that he brought inflation down, trimmed taxes, bolstered the nation's defense, and worked for less domestic government. Then, too, a key issue in any campaign involving an incumbent President is his leadership. In this case, unlike 1980, the people approved of it. In addition, the voters are in a good mood, and they feel good about their future. The traditional optimism of America has returned even though the economic statistics that reflect national well-being have not changed much in four years. There are criticisms to be made of the losing effort, but given the circumstances I believe that neither Mr. Mondale nor any other Democrat could have won the Presidency in 1984.●

DIPLOMATIC RECIPROCITY

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, Today I introduced legislation that would correct a serious disparity that has existed for many years in our relations with the Soviet Union. While we are allowed to send no more than 300 diplomats to the Soviet Union, they have approximately 1,000 diplomats here in this country. To some people this may not seem unusual, but given the fact that many of the Soviet diplomats are in actuality KGB agents or operatives, this situation becomes extremely grave.

Recent Soviet defectors to the West have made it very clear that the U.S.S.R. maintains such large staffs in Western democracies for the sole purpose of furthering clandestine Soviet foreign policy objectives. These objectives include such activities as gathering military and technological information, planting and disseminating disinformation in the media that is favorable to the Soviets or unfavorable to the United States, and recruiting agents of influence from among the ranks of journalists, politicians, and the military.

Given the fact that the Soviets have 700 more diplomats here in the United States than we have in the Soviet Union, I believe that it is essential that we correct this disparity. This bill would limit the number of Soviet diplomats in this country to the same number of diplomats that the United States is permitted to send to the Soviet Union. This idea of reciprocity would extend to any other Communist country as well, thereby keeping the number of Communist dipolmats at a more reasonable level. This bill would also apply to diplomatic immunities—any immunity that is not granted to our diplomats will not be granted to their diplomats here.

I believe that passage of this bill is in the best interest of our national security and our diplomatic representatives stationed in Communist countries, and I, therefore, hope that my colleagues will join me in cosponsoring it.●

HEALTH EMERGENCY TREATMENT FUND

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, when a community is injured by a hurricane, flood, or crippling fire, a wide range of Federal assistance programs are available to State and local governments. When these natural disasters strike we do not expect States or communities to be able to shoulder the burden of protecting public health and rebuilding property alone. The Federal Government has long been committed to supplementing local efforts.

I believe the same rationale should apply when a public health emergency, such as the recent outbreak of acquired immune deficiency syndrome, arises. Epidemics are often localized in certain cities or regions. Yet State and local governments cannot anticipate these sudden crises when formulating their budgets. Hospitals and health departments may be unable to transfer adequate resources. Sufficient funding for facilities, personnel and equipment may simply not be available.

A mechanism that permits the Federal Government to step in, as needed, is essential. Understanding and compassion are not enough.

Mr. Speaker, a bill I am introducing today along with Mr. WAXMAN, Mr. ROYBAL, and Mrs. BOXER, would establish a revolving fund for treatment and prevention services in response to a public health emergency. The money would be provided, on an emergency basis only, through grants and contracts to State and local governments in areas particularly hard hit by a health crisis. Those governing bodies would have the option of contracting out services to institutions such as hospitals, hospices and nonprofit organizations. I am requesting $60 million for the first year of the revolving fund.

This legislation would amend the public health emergency fund enacted into law during the last Congress. The act, authored by the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN], provides emergency funds for research into the cause, treatment and prevention of health crises. The revolving fund I am proposing today would complement the public health emergency fund by providing for actual treatment and prevention.

The best example of the need for these funds is also the most timely example. AIDS has hit particularly hard in certain cities across the country such as New York, San Francisco, Newark, Los Angeles, Houston, and Washington, DC. The local governments are doing the best they can to respond with treatment and prevention efforts, but they are drawing on already scarce resources. Public hospitals are overwhelmed.

The cost of treatment, estimated at about $60,000 to $100,000 per patient, is staggering. Over 7,400 persons have contracted AIDS nationwide: we are therefore looking at a minimum of $450 million in medical bills. And if the number of AIDS cases continues to more than double every year, the cost of this health care will be in the billions.

The tremendous cost is compounded by the unfortunate reality that many persons with AIDS do not have health insurance. Those who are covered may carry a policy that does not reimburse for experimental treatment or runs out because of the size of the medical bills. Victims must wait 2 years before they quality for Medicare disability benefits. Many do not qualify for public assistance or medicaid.

In a letter to the Journal of the American Medical Association, a group of physicians from New Jersey reported:

We find that a large portion of our AIDS populations is indigent and unable to obtain requisite outpatient care. Once discharged, they can neither eat well enough to bolster their deficient nutritional state nor afford the many drugs required for their multiple infections.

Without outside help, local efforts can be expected to focus only on the most immediate needs. However, the nature of AIDS, I believe, requires an outpouring of psychological and social support. Needed services cover a broad spectrum: individual and group therapy, legal assistance, home care, hospice care, medical referrals, training for health professionals, crisis intervention, and guidance through a maze of public assistance, health and disability programs.

In many instances, patients require additional support to deal with the feelings of isolation and loss that result from disruptions in their jobs, personal lives and social networks. Prevention, in the form of extensive public education, outreach and early screening, may save lives as well as money.

Mr. Speaker, a small but growing number of Americans are suffering from a frightening disease. It is imperative that the Congress communication to those individuals—as well as the health authorities in the communities in which they reside—that they need not face the struggle alone.

I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this important legislation. The text of the bill follows:

H.R. 232

A bill to amend the Public Health Service Act to provide funds for the prevention and treatment of public health emergencies

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 319 of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 247d) is amended by adding at the end the following:

SEC. 2. Subsection (b) of section 319 of the Public Health Service Act is amended by striking out "Fund" each place it occurs and inserting in lieu thereof "Research Fund".●

DESIGNATING THE FEDERAL BUILDING IN AKRON, OH, AS THE PAUL C. WEICK FEDERAL BUILDING AND U.S. COURTHOUSE

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to reintroduce legislation today which would designate the Federal Building in Akron, OH, as the "Paul C. Weick Federal Building and United States Courthouse," in honor of Judge Paul C. Weick of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, one of our most distinguished citizens.

When I first introduced this legislation in October 1984, I realized that, as a general rule, we do not name Federal buildings for living individuals. However, in this instance, I believe an exception to that rule is in order.

Judge Weick has proven himself a giant in the legal profession and has excelled in his devotion to public service in the Greater Akron area. After graduation from the University of Cincinnati College of Law in 1920, Judge Weick began his career as a trial attorney in Akron. In 1956, President Eisenhower appointed him to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, and he served on that court until 1959, when President Eisenhower appointed him to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. He became chief judge of that court in 1963 and served until 1969, when reached age 70. He continues as an active judge of the court.

Judge Weick has received many awards and honors, including: A Presidential Certificate of Appreciation for services rendered to the Selective Service System, 1956; an honorary LL.D. degree from the University of Cincinnati, 1965; the Ohio State Bar Association Foundation Award for "Devotion to the Legal Profession and Contribution to the Public Good," 1965; the University of Akron Centennial Award for his distinguished and dedicated service as a lawyer and judge, 1970; and Joint Certificate of Appreciation of the Cleveland Bar Association, Cuyahoga County Bar Association and Cleveland Chapter of Federal Bar Association.

Judge Weick has also been an active leader of the legal profession. He served as president of the Akron Bar Association 1940–41, and president of the Ohio Bar Association 1950–51. He was a member of the Judicial Conference of the United States from 1963 to 1969, and the Trial Practice and Technique Committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States, 1968–69. His present memberships and associations include: fellow, American Bar Association Foundation; fellow and trustee, Ohio State Bar Foundation; fellow, Garfield Society, Hiram College; member, Akron, Ohio State and American Bar Association; Member, American Judicature Society and Institute of Judicial Administration; trustee, Akron Law Library Association; and an honorary member of Phi Alpha Delta Law Fraternity International.

This proposal to name the Federal building after Judge Weick has become a popular idea back home, and I'm grateful to have the support of two of Ohio's major newspapers, the Akron Beacon Journal and the Cleveland Plain Dealer, and the strong support of State Senator Lee Fisher, who has been extremely helpful in this effort. A recent Beacon Journal editorial praised Judge Weick, stating:

It would be difficult to write a history of the law and judicial system in Akron without including a lengthy chapter on Paul Weick. Judge Weick's record over the years clearly reflects a jurist of impeccable care, a legal scholar of the highest intergrity and intelligence. His judicial role had been national in stature. Judge Weick once referred to Akron as a "city of opportunity for me." A courthouse bearing his name in a most fitting way for his adopted city to return the compliment.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with you the words of one of Judge Weick's colleagues:

Judge Paul C. Weick has unselfishly devoted, to this day, his life to improve the law and to do whatever he could to promote the well-being of the citizens of the Greater Akron area. His distinguished and dedicated service as a private person, as a lawyer and as a judge, mandates that we, as beneficiaries of his good deeds, can do no less than honor this great man during his lifetime.

Mr. Speaker, we can appropriately honor this outstanding American by dedicating the Federal building and U.S. Courthouse in Akron, OH, in his honor.●

NEW INITIATIVES ON CRIME

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, October 31, 1984, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

NEW INITIATIVES ON CRIME

The most surprising accomplishment of the 98th Congress was the passage, just before adjournment, of The Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984. It is the largest and most far-reaching anti-crime bill since Congress last overhauled the federal criminal code in 1968. Its scope and size are impressive. The final bill is 635 pages long, and contains provisions dealing with virtually every area of federal criminal law.

The bill had a tortuous legislative history. Congress has struggled for more than a decade to make major changes in the federal criminal code. In 1982 the President vetoed an omnibus crime bill that contained several of the current reforms. The bill passed this year only after two years of debate and legislative maneuvering, and only as an amendment to a necessary funding bill. It is not as broad as earlier reform proposals, but it includes most of their major elements. It passed the Congress with overwhelming bipartisan support.

The main characteristic of the bill is its expansion of the federal government's authority. In nearly every instance, there is a shift away from protecting the rights of criminals, and toward those of the public and the prerogatives of law enforcement agencies. That shift follows public opinion as well as the pattern of Supreme Court opinions.

The largest reform is in federal sentencing procedure. Traditionally, federal judges have had great discretion in the sentencing of criminals. Consequently, criminals convicted of the same crimes often get very different sentences. To reduce disparities in punishment for the same crimes, the bill outlines four goals of sentencing and requires a presidentially-appointed commission to draw up guidelines for judges to use. Judges who deviate from the guidelines must explain in writing their reasons for doing so. Both prosecutors and defendants may appeal sentences that do not conform to the guidelines. The bill also phases out federal parole after a five-year period. Under current law, about 80% of all criminals are paroled after serving one third of their time. Now sentences will be reduced only 15% for good behavior.

The bill also makes a dramatic change in federal bail law. For the first time, federal judges may detain a defendant before trial if they determine that he poses a danger to the community. In the past, bail had to be granted unless there was reason to believe that the defendant would flee before trial. The plan is similar to those used by 32 states. Even though our criminal law is based on a presumption of innocence, the Supreme Court has indicated that "preventive detention" does not violate the Constitution. The bill includes safeguards—such as a requirement that a judge list in writing his reasons for refusing bail—to minimize risks of abuse.

One of the more controversial provisions in the bill is the reform of the federal insanity defense. The new rule is a direct response to the John Hinckley case. It restricts the use of insanity as a defense to individuals who are unable to understand the nature and wrongfulness of their acts. Mere "lack of control" because of mental disability will no longer be allowed as a defense. The new rule revises at least a century of legal precedent by shifting the burden of proof from the prosecutor, who formerly had to prove that the defendant was not insane, to the defendant, who now must prove that he is. Since the insanity defense is used in less than 1% of all criminal cases, the effect of the change will not be great. Symbolically, however, it is much more important. The new rule is a definition of criminal responsibility that puts federal law squarely behind the rights of the general public.

The bill also has several provisions to increase the federal role in the fight against drug trafficking. Fines and penalties are sharply increased. There are also provisions to make it easier for officials to seize the profits and assets of drug traffickers, depriving racketeers of the economic power used to sustain their operations. The bill also creates a high-level interagency council to coordinate the diverse activities of federal drug enforcement agencies.

In addition to making these reforms, the bill improves the federal witness protection program, prohibits trafficking in goods using a counterfeit trademark, and establishes a fund for victims of crime to be financed through fines collected from federal convicts. Also, it facilitates federal prosecution of certain career criminals, prevents credit card fraud and computer fraud for purposes of obtaining classified information, and makes it easier to use foreign evidence in criminal proceedings. Finally, the bill tightens laws against labor racketeering, assists states in locating missing children and in combating juvenile delinquency, and creates a program of grants targeted at critical state crime problems such as jail overcrowding.

The bill will not solve our crime problem. More than 95% of the violent crime that frightens most Americans—robbery, rape, murder—falls under the jurisdiction of state and local agencies. The bill's impact on local crime cannot be ignored, however. The bill gives direct aid to the states, and encourages cooperation among law enforcement agencies at all levels. Then, too, federal initiatives often serve as models for the states.

Even these reforms will not be effective unless the federal government increases resources for law enforcement. The President proposed cuts of 20% and more for law enforcement agencies when he came to office, cuts that were, for the most part, restored by Congress. Sufficient resources are essential to effective crime-fighting efforts. Most states cannot afford sharp increases in their law enforcement budgets. It is clear that the federal government must do more.

We are told that the crime rate is falling all across America. I hope that this is so, but, in light of similar past projections, I remain skeptical. I do welcome the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 as a helpful step in the nationwide effort to make our streets safe again.●

SUBSIDIZING THE COMMUNISTS

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced legislation that would prohibit all extensions of credit, credit guarantees, investment guarantees, or grants by any agency of the U.S. Government to any Communist country. I believe that the time has come for us to cease financing the inhuman and reprehensible activities of Communist countries with aid and loans from our official lending institutions and governmental agencies.

The words of Soviet defector Aleksandr Solzhenitzyn ought not to be ignored when discussing loans or credits to the Soviets in particular, but to any Communist country as well. He stated: "I think, gentleman, that we should at last permit this socialist economy to prove its superiority. Let's allow it to show that it is advanced, that it is omnipotent, that it has defeated you, that it has overtaken you. Let us not interfere with it. Let us stop selling to it and giving it loans." If we do this, Solzhenitsyn counsels, "* * * the Soviet economy will no longer be able to deal with everything, [and] will have to reduce its military preparations * * * to feed and clothe its own people. And the system will be forced to relax." By loaning them money and bailing them out in times of economic crisis, we "are merely helping them to rearm * * * helping the Soviet police state."

But if we continue to finance the Soviets and those countries within their sphere of influence, the consequences may be grave indeed. As Solzhenitsyn concludes, "And if this sort of unity cannot be achieved in the West, if, in the frenzied competition of one company with another they will continue to rush in loans and advanced technology, if they will present earthmoving equipment to our gravediggers, then I'm afraid that Lenin will turn out to have been right. He had said: " The bourgeoisie will sell us rope, and then we shall let the bourgeoisie hang itself."

I urge my colleagues to join me in bringing an end to Soviet oppression of its people by cosponsoring this legislation. But at the same time I urge my colleagues to take this first step in cutting off loans to the Soviet bloc in order to avert our own doom.●

BUDGET AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing legislation to require distinctions in the Federal budget between capital outlays and financing on the one hand and current operational expenditures and revenues on the other.

When a business, a city, a State, or practically any other enterprise computes its profit or loss or its surplus or deficit for a given year, it does so by deducting expenses from revenues. Separate and distinct consideration is given to long-term expenditures for capital needs as compared with current operating expenses.

Such a two-part budget is a much more accurate, rational, and useful portrayal of actual financial status than is the combined budget currently employed by the Federal Government. By balancing current operating income with expenses and by comparing long-term capital outlays with long-term financing, a much clearer and concise budgetary picture emerges.

In the private sector, borrowing to finance capital outlays is universally considered sound business practice, while borrowing to meet operational needs in not. Were the Federal Government to employ the budget methodology used by almost every other financial entity, the extent of the Federal budget deficit used to finance capital, as compared with operational, expenditures would become plain to policymakers and the public.

A capital-operational breakdown in the Federal budget would in no way mask the current deficit crisis. Rather, it is a sound bookkeeping measure that would significantly aid in responsible fiscal planning. Indeed, such a budget would likely facilitate the identification of poor fiscal managment and increase accountability to the American people. It would enhance the likelihood of a prompt and effective response to the growing Federal budget deficit.

As it exists today, the Federal budget is grossly misleading. The legislation I am offering would bring needed and helpful clarity to the budgetmaking process and would also encourage more informed participation by both Congress and the public in this process.

I strongly urge my colleagues to support this effort to regularize and simplify the Federal budget.

A copy of this legislation follows:

H.R. 231

A bill to amend title 31 of the United States Code, and the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to require the inclusion of certain figures on capital and operational expenditures in the budgets transmitted to the Congress by the President and in the first concurrent resolutions on the budget

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Budget Amendments Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 1105(a) of title 31 of the United States Code is amended—

(1) by striking out "estimated expenditures" in paragraph (5) before "and proposed appropriations necessary" and inserting in lieu thereof "estimated capital expenditures and estimated operational expenditures";

(2) by striking out "expenditures" in paragraph (7) and inserting in lieu thereof "capital expenditures, operational expenditures"; and

(3) by striking out "estimated expenditures and receipts" in paragraph (8) and inserting in lieu thereof "estimated capital expenditures, estimated operational expenditures, estimated receipts".

SEC. 3. Section 301(a)(2) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 is amended by inserting "for capital expenses and for operational expenses" after "an estimate of budget outlays".

SEC. 4. (a) Section 2 shall take effect with respect to all budgets transmitted pursuant to section 1105(a) of title 31 of the United States Code, more than thirty days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) Section 3 shall take effect with respect to all first concurrent resolutions on the budget reported to both the House of Representatives and the Senate pursuant to section 301(d) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (31 U.S.C. 1322(d)) more than thirty days after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

END BIG OIL'S FOREIGN TAX CREDIT

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing legislation I first introduced in 1983 to end one of the more outrageous features of our tax system—the foreign tax credit for U.S. petroleum companies. Congress restricted the foreign tax credit in the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 [TEFRA], but there is still room for improvement. My bill, the Oil Industry Foreign Tax Credit Reform Act, would provide that improvement.

According to a June 1978 report of the House Committee on Government Operations, entitled "Foreign Tax Credits Claimed by U.S. Petroleum Companies," the issue of foreign tax credits for petroleum companies first arose in 1950, when the Saudi Arabian Government sought more revenue from its oil properties. After consultation with American oil and tax experts, the Saudi Government decided to levy an income tax on Aramco, then the country's sole oil producer, in lieu of increasing its oil extraction royalties. At that time, Aramco requested an Internal Revenue Service ruling as to whether the payments made to Saudi Arabia could be taken as a credit or a deduction.

The Treasury Department wrote four major memorandums from 1951 to 1954 complaining that Aramco's scheme was a sham: If the IRS ruled that the royalty payments were a credit, Aramco could simply shift its tax payments from the United States to Saudi Arabia with no net effect on the company's own cash-flow. But the U.S. State Department and the National Security Council intervened and requested that a favorable ruling be issued so that the Saudi Government could receive additional revenues. A favorable retroactive ruling was issued in 1955. Between 1955 and 1983, the foreign oil tax credit has cost the U.S. Treasury over $14 billion.

Congress tightened up the credit when it enacted TEFRA in 1982. Section 211 of TEFRA requires oil companies in computing the amount of the foreign oil tax credit to net their extraction losses in one country against their extraction income in another. Under prior law, a foreign tax credit could be taken for extraction income from one country even when a company had net extraction losses from its combined foreign oil and gas operations. According to the Joint Committee on Taxation, this provision, along with another requiring taxation of nonextraction income from foreign oil company operations, will raise some $2.3 billion over fiscal years 1983 to 1987.

Even with these reforms, however, the oil companies are still permitted to credit their royalty payments against their U.S. income tax, instead of deducting them as a normal business expense. The bill I am introducing today would require that foreign taxes on foreign oil and gas income be treated for tax purposes as royalties. Thus, instead of providing dollar-for-dollar tax savings, royalties payments would produce tax savings ranging between the amount of the payments multiplied by either the effective U.S. tax rate on worldwide income and the marginal corporate tax rate.

The House has addressed this issue in the past. On May 8, 1979, by a 355–66 vote, such a change was approved as an amendment to the first concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1980. That amendment, however, was never enacted as substantive law. At a time when the Federal deficit under the Reagan administration will hit $210 billion, and at a time when the Congress will undoubtedly be under great pressure to slash Federal spending on domestic human needs programs in order to reduce the deficit and lessen its impact on the economy, it is high time the Congress acted to ensure that big oil pays its fair share of Federal taxes. Enactment of my bill would end this inequity.●

FREDERICK N. WEATHERS

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced legislation which would rename the U.S. Postal Service building located at 3415 North Kings Highway in St. Louis the "Frederick N. Weathers Station of the U.S. Postal Service."

Mr. Speaker, Fred Weathers—known by many as the dean of black politicians in St. Louis—has contributed immeasurably to the improvement and betterment of St. Louis. His judgment, his commitment to social justice, his energy, and his political astuteness are valued and well known to St. Louisans and others. The designation of this post office building in honor of Fred Weathers will memorialize his contributions and will ensure that future generations will know of his special and incalculable gifts to the St. Louis community.

Fred Weathers served as Democratic committeeman for the 18th ward of St. Louis for 28 years and among his many other activities was the owner of the Marcella Cab Co., St. Louis' oldest taxicab service. In addition, for many years, he was active in the Young Mens Christian Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Renaming this postal facility in honor of Fred Weathers is but one means by which the Congress may, on behalf of all St. Louisans, both recognize and honor this fine man his enduring contributions to St. Louis.●

MR. REAGAN'S SECOND TERM

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, December 5, 1984 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

MR. REAGAN'S SECOND TERM

Where is the nation headed in President Reagan's second term?

Generally, I think that the issues guarantee hard days ahead. Still, the President has a rare chance to lead in domestic and foreign affairs. The polls show widespread approval of Mr. Reagan's performance in office, but no agreement on future policies. Apparently the President's win was personal, without much ideological underpinning. As a referendum on the present, the judgment of the voters is clear. As a mandate for the future, it is not. The big question is: "How does Mr. Reagan interpret his victory?" He has not given a clue. His campaign has not prepared the public for action to come, whether domestic or foreign.

On the economic front, the President's main problems are budget and trade deficits, high interest rates, and a strong dollar. He has but a short time to assert control. It seems to me that Mr. Reagan will make a mistake if he stands pat with his victory at the polls, regarding it as a vindication of the view that domestic spending cuts and economic growth will get deficits, interest rates, and the dollar's value down.

My guess is that reduced domestic spending heads the President's list of priorities. We can expect him to recommend cuts in welfare, medicare, federal pensions, student aid, nutrition, and farm and veterans' programs. I think that requests for increased defense spending will keep coming to Capitol Hill. Mr. Reagan's promises will make it tough to enact a package of spending cuts and tax increases, the combination that most observers believe necessary to cut deficits substantially.

The real question for me is whether more of the same will help the economy. Ominous data from the Office of Management and Budget collide head on with the President's promises, but in the end Mr. Reagan, not his budget analysts, will choose either the view that economic growth cures all ills or the view that deficits matter and must be attacked. My sense is that the President has not yet decided how much to reduce the deficit, how to do it, and how quickly to proceed. Tax reform is high on Mr. Reagan's agenda. He is attracted to a modified "flat tax," with a preference for simplicity. There may be a veiled reference to higher taxes in all the talk of tax reform.

The launching of new arms control talks tops the list of foreign policy priorities. The Geneva meeting scheduled for January is an early indication of this. The so-called unbrella proposal (all types of arms control issues are to be addressed together at first) seems to be another indication of the desire for movement. The President ought to take charge of the negotiations even if a high degree of involvement in such talks would be uncharacteristic of him. In his first term, he was not prepared to resolve disagreements on arms control among his chief advisers. Mr. Reagan is personally determined to give arms control a chance, but will have to "crack heads" inside the bureaucracy.

Even though foreign policy was not very prominent in the eyes of the voters, the President got support for his commitment to build American strength and project American will. Consequently, I am looking for continuity. The fight against terrorism will get more resources. Mr. Reagan will have to move decisively to save the MX missile, but much of the rest of his military buildup is safely underway. In Central America, the government of El Salvador will get more backing now that President Duarte is in charge. The interesting struggle within the administration at the moment is between the hardliners, who advocate overthrow of the Sandinista government of Nicaragua, and the moderates, who believe such an effort is counterproductive to American interests. Only the President can resolve that dispute.

What will be new in 1985? The rising tide of imports could make trade a dominant issue. Concern for economic recovery in Europe and the Third World will be in evidence. Also, there will be an effort to slow the spread of nuclear weapons. We will remain involved in the Middle East, but we will focus on short-range goals. Aid to Israel will be increased. We will try to get foreign troops out of Lebanon as we try to improve the lot of the Palestinians. I do not expect a major peace initiative in the Middle East.

Mr. Reagan faces a divided Congress that may not fall into line with him. Many Democrats are unhappy about the way the tax issue was used against them in the campaign. They say that the President is on his own and must get his program through Congress by himself. Republican leaders are unhappy about the Reagan campaign. They claim that it did not stress congressional races enough.

Just as they did in 1981, the Democratic conservatives in the House may hold the trump cards. Their support will be essential to Mr. Reagan in many ways, and the President will have to decide how much he will concede to them. If he chooses to work with Congress, his initial approaches may have to come through them.

Turmoil may lead to deadlock in this session. There was a small turnover among legislators in the election, and those returning will be dealing with many issues that they have seen before. They know what they are about, and they, too, have mandates from their districts and states. Strong leadership from Mr. Reagan will be required to keep Congress from grinding to a halt.

In other areas, the picture is mixed. The President, seemingly satisfied with the so-called safety net, may do nothing for the poor. My guess is that he will speak up on tuition tax credits, anti-abortion measures, and school prayer as he did in the first term, but he will spend little political capital doing so. A farm initiative may push us toward market-oriented programs at home and expanded markets overseas. There will not be much government reorganization, but speculation lingers that the President may try to abolish the Department of Education. Health care policy will generate controversy as policy makers try to hold down costs and seek answers to questions about life and death arising from innovative technology.●

AUDIT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to require the General Accounting Office to conduct a complete and thorough audit of the Federal Reserve System and banks.

This bill provides that:

The Comptroller General * * * shall make * * * an audit for each fiscal year of the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Advisory Council, the Federal Open Market Committee, and all Federal Reserve Banks and their branches, including transactions of the system's open market account conducted through recognized dealers.

The bill further provides that the General Accounting Office shall have access to all books and records of the Federal Reserve.

Such an audit of the Federal Reserve is necessary when one considers that the Federal Reserve, the FDIC, and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency "are empowered to carry out functions crucial to our system of government and to our Nation's economy." Yet amazingly enough, Congress enacted a law that prevents the GAO from auditing these vital entities of our national government. The ramifications of this secrecy take on greater significance when one considers that the Monetary Control Act allows the Fed to purchase paper obligations of foreign governments and use them as collateral for Federal Reserve notes.

In stating a reason for excluding these crucial functions from the purview of the GAO audit, the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs wrote in 1978:

* * * The Federal Reserve Board must be able to independently conduct the Nation's monetary policy * * *.

The independence of the Fed has long been used as a device to shield the Fed from congressional investigation. It is time that we recognized that the independence of the Fed is a legal fiction. The American public and the Congress are entitled to know what the Fed is up to. The sooner we find out the better off we will be. The system deserves no more blind faith and support from the American people.●

BIAGGI SEEKS OUTLAWING OF PLASTIC BULLETS IN NORTHERN IRELAND

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the bipartisan ad hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs I am today introducing a concurrent resolution expressing the opposition of Congress to the use of plastic bullets in Northern Ireland by British security forces.

This resolution resembles one I had introduced in the 98th Congress. Yet, an event which took place on August 12, 1984, provides a more graphic reason than ever for the passage of this resolution. The place was Belfast, Northern Ireland. A rally was called at which it was announced that one Martin Galvin—a U.S. citizens who was to lead a delegation of Americans on a visit to Northern Ireland was to speak. What made this rally unusual was the fact that Galvin had been barred from entering Northern Ireland by the British Government. However, Galvin did enter the north illegally—and the rally was called for the purpose of having him speak. A crowd of more than 2,000, including the American delegation, assembled peacefully. Mr. Galvin did appear as scheduled and just as soon as he was visible the British security forces who surrounded the rally charged into the crowd in an attempt to get Galvin. This provoked, in the words of Newsweek magazine, "one of the worst scenes of police violence seen in the province in years."

The tragic result of this police action was one innocent civilian killed—scores of people injured including some Americans. What was most appalling about this incident was the fact that more than 30 rounds of plastic bullets were fired into the crowd including one that was fired at Sean Downes at pointblank range that killed him.

The August 12 incident was not the first of its kind in Northern Ireland. The fact is that a total of eight persons including five individuals under the age of 15 have been killed by plastic bullets since 1981. In addition more than 200 persons have been injured—including some who were blinded.

The presence of plastic bullets and their indiscriminate use in Northern Ireland dramatically makes the point that violence in Northern Ireland is an ugly two-sided coin. We know about the civilian violence—the indiscriminate bombs planted by supporters of the IRA—and the sectarian-based killings of Catholics by certain Protestant factions. However, what does not get the attention in this Nation and the world is the official violence such as the misuse of the plastic bullet. Both forms of violence are wrong and must be ended if there is to be any hope for a lasting peace in Northern Ireland.

The European Parliament on two occasions, the most recent being in 1984, passed resolution calling for the end to the use of plastic bullets in Northern Ireland. It is time for the Congress to take a similar stand for we are hypocritical if we only denounce one form of violence in Northern Ireland.

I hope for the cosponsorship of my colleagues on this measure.●

TRIBUTE TO GEN. DRAZA MIHAILOVICH

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill that seeks to make amends, at least in part, for one of the great historical injustices of World War II.

Many of my colleagues may remember Gen. Draza Mihailovich of Yugoslavia, one of the foremost freedom fighters in the European resistance movement during World War II. As you may recall, Mihailovich and his Chetnik forces were directly responsible for saving the lives of some 500 American airmen forced down in Axis-controlled Yugoslavia. Despite the fact that he fought against the Nazis, Mihailovich, a victim of Communist propaganda, was executed as a war criminal by Tito's forces following the war.

The United States was in part responsible for the fate of General Mihailovich and the Chetnik forces when it elected to follow the British lead to support Tito. Recent evidence indicates that the decision made by the United States and the British was based on skewed intelligence reports submitted by Cambridge-recruited Soviet spies within the British military.

The bill that I am introducing authorizes the National Commission of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich to establish a public monument to honor the general for his role in saving the lives of these U.S. airmen. The Commission has agreed to finance the entire construction and maintenance of the monument.

It is only fitting that we honor this hero for his courage and undying support to the Allied cause. I urge you to join me in recognizing the valor of General Mihailovich.●

SOCIAL SECURITY REFORM LEGISLATION

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to alleviate some of the economic hardships and gross inequities which older persons so frequently encounter in our society. This legislative package would ensure improved and equitable treatment for both women and men under the Social Security System.

Steps were taken during the last Congress to increase retirement income, including increased social security benefits for certain older women. Much remains to be done, however.

Social Security is a lifeline for women in retirement. It is the most common and the most important single source of income for the elderly. Over half of all married couples, two-thirds of all single men, and nearly three-fourths of all single women who receive Social Security depend on it for at least half of their income. In fact, less than 20 percent of older women receive any private pension benefits at all.

Inequities in the Social Security System greatly contribute to older women's poverty and dependency. At least 9 out of 10 women who are covered by the Social Security System can expect to experience some form of discrimination during retirement.

Retired workers who are married often receive a benefit that is less than if they had never worked or paid into the system at all.

Homemakers, who move in and out of the labor force to have and raise children or care for sick parents, are not eligible for disability if they have been out of the work force for more than 5 years.

Divorced women who were married for less than 10 years receive no benefits.

Widows cannot receive benefits before the age of 60 unless they are disabled or have children under 16.

Widows who choose to accept benefits at age 60 due to financial necessity receive greatly reduced benefits for their entire lives.

The legislation which I am introducing today addresses these problems through both long-term and short-term solutions. My first bill, mandatory earnings sharing, would eliminate a large number of retirement problems currently encountered by women. The two-income couple would no longer be short changed. The divorced woman would carry Social Security credits from her marriage. Women entering and leaving the workplace would be able to use all Social Security credits to determine their benefits. Homemakers would be eligible for disability benefits.

A summary of my legislative package follows:

MANDATORY EARNINGS SHARING

The bill provides that the Social Security credits earned during a marriage would be divided equally when determining eligibility and retirement benefits. Social Security earnings would also be divided upon divorce and, under this system, a widow(er) would be able to receive a full survivor benefit.

TRANSITION BENEFITS

Transitional Social Security benefits would be provided for surviving spouses who, upon the death of the insured wage-earner partner, must prepare for employment. These benefits would be available for 4 months after the wage-earner's death to a surviving spouse who is at least 50 years old and not otherwise eligible for benefits.

DISABLED WIDOWS(ER)S UNDER 60

Under present law, disabled surviving spouses are eligible for benefits at an actuarially reduced rate beginning at age 50, based on the deceased worker's primary insurance amount [PIA]. This bill would make disabled surviving spouse eligible for benefits at any age and with no restrictions.

CHILD CARE CREDITS

The special minimum benefit for long-term low wage earners would be amended to allow child care credits to be counted in the determination of benefits. (The special minimum benfit only applies to long-term low wage earners whose payments would be low if computed by another method). A benefit earner could be credited with up to 10 years for the care of any children 6 years older or younger with the stipulation that the applicant's care lasted at least 6 months out of the year. The number of years that could be counted toward special minimum benefits would be increased from 30 to 36.

RESTORATION OF THE MINUMUM SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFIT

As a result of a provision contained in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981, Minimum Social Security benefits were eliminated for those persons who would have been otherwise eligible after January 1982. Minimum benefits were awarded to workers who would receive a lesser amount on their low earnings record or short-term work. Of the 3 million currently receiving the $122 monthly payment, 2.3 million are women. This bill will restore the benefit to those needy people beginning with the date of enactment of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981.

ELIMINATION OF THE GOVERNMENT PENSION OFFSET PROVISION

Beginning in July 1983, persons who were eligible to retire from public service had their Social Security spousal benefits reduced by two-thirds of the amount of the public pension. This bill would eliminate the Government pension offset provision from Social Security law.

Mr. Speaker, this legislative reform package has been carefully crafted to enhance benefit protection for all Social Security recipients. It maintains both equity and adequacy in the system, as it attempts to reflect the changing roles of men and women. Legislative hearings conducted by my aging committee's task force on Social Security and women, symposiums on the system, Presidential commissions, and private studies have all revealed that the system must meet the needs of half its recipients—women. I believe that enough posturing has been done on this issue and that it is time for action.

In several days, the Department of Health and Human Services will be releasing a long awaited report on my earnings sharing legislation. A recent New York Times article anticipated that their analysis of the feasibility of an earnings sharing approach, which was mandated by the 1983 Social Security Amendments, will denounce the concept of earnings sharing and call for more short-term solutions to this complex problem of inequity. While I have not received a copy of the HHS report, I cannot help but wonder whether they have completely understood their task or have fulfilled their obligation. The earnings sharing concept must not be dismissed but enhanced. I plan to hold very early hearings on HHS' report and a private study which has been completed in the past several months. And, it is my understanding that Congressman PICKLE will also examine the issue of how women fair under the Social Security system. I am certain that both comprehensive examinations will prove what has been stated over and over again—Social Security needs to be modernized.

I encourage all my colleagues to support all of the bills I introduced today. Thank you.●

THE TREASURY TAX REFORM PROPOSAL

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, December 19, 1984 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE TREASURY TAX REFORM PROPOSAL

Secretary of Treasury Donald Regan recently released his plan for simplifying our byzantine federal tax code. It is not a tax increase in disguise, but a "revenue neutral" simplification, shifting tax burdens from moderate-income persons to businesses and the wealthy. It has been praised by groups traditionally championing the disadvantaged and middle class, and criticized by the well-to-do and business. It is a surprising plan to emerge from the Reagan Treasury Department because it takes dead aim at many of the President's political constituencies.

Tax simplification is necessary because the existing system has been weakened by numerous loopholes, deductions, and exemptions added over the past 70 years. The result is a serious erosion of the tax base, an unfair bias to certain individuals and industries, distortion of investment decisions in the quest for tax advantages, and a system incomprehensible to the average taxpayer. By virtually every criterion, our tax system falls short. The heart of the Treasury tax reform proposal is to end many of the special tax preferences in the code in order to reduce overall tax rates. An individual may lose a particular tax benefit under the plan, but that would be generally offset by a lower tax rate. Overall, individuals would pay an average 8.5% less in taxes. Corporations would also receive lower tax rates, but the elimination of various tax preferences would increase the corporate share of taxes from an estimated 8.5% of the total now to 15% in 1990.

Besides the overall shift to greater business taxation, there would be clear winners and losers among different industries and individual taxpayers. For individuals, there would be a slight easing of the burden on low- and middle-income groups. But the major shift would be within each income group, as the wide disparities in taxes paid by individuals making roughly the same amount of money would be reduced. Cutting back sharply the allowable deductions and tax preferences means higher taxes for heavy itemizers and lower taxes for those who now file relatively simple income tax forms. Overall, 78% would get a tax cut or pay roughly what they pay now, while 22% would be taxed more heavily.

The changes on the corporate side would result in more equal tax burdens among different sectors. The current system gives significant tax benefits to some businesses and not others; for example banks pay few taxes. The present tax code advantages for banking, insurance, housing, oil and gas drilling, and "smokestack" industries would be lessened, thus helping other sectors, such as retailers, service industries, and high-tech corporations. The Treasury goal is to end the discriminatory effect of the tax code on different kinds of businesses.

The general thrust of the Treasury tax simplification proposal agrees with what most Hoosiers have been telling me they want in the tax code, and apparently with what most citizens want, as shown in numerous opinion polls.

One major concern is that Congress should not take up a difficult debate on a revenue-neutral tax reform proposal while major work is needed on reducing our federal deficit. However, it does not seem to me that the two are incompatible. Dual-track action on tax reform and budget reform is possible. Reducing the staggering deficits should clearly be the top priority of Congress next session. But passing meaningful tax reform can assist that effort, even if the reform is revenue neutral—shifting the various tax burdens rather than increasing the overall amount of the tax levied. In the first place, some 13% of the federal budget goes for interest payments on the national debt. The Treasury plan should help reduce real interest rates by cutting back the significant tax incentives for businesses and individuals to borrow money. Second, the Treasury plan attempts to encourage investors to seek the greatest economic return rather than the greatest tax shelter. That in time should help improve productivity and economic growth, which means more federal tax revenue. Third, the plan could increase taxpayer compliance. Each year some $100 billion is lost to the treasury through tax evasion and cheating. Lowering the tax rates and replacing the loophole-ridden code with a fair one would help curb taxpayer disgust with the system and reduce incentives to cheat. Finally, reducing the deficit will require painful spending cuts. People may be more receptive to making these sacrifices if they know that a tax system considered unfair and benefiting special interests is also being changed. In short, meaningful tax reform could go hand in hand with our efforts to reduce the deficit.

The immediate reaction to the Treasury's plan casts doubt on its prospects. President Reagan has said some nice things about it, but he has carefully refrained from giving it his blessing. Groups adversely affected by it are gearing up for a major assault. If the battle for deficit reduction is combined with tax reform, there will probably be an extended period of complicated maneuvering, the outcome of which is hard to predict. The tax reform package is so sweeping that unless the President insists on it early in 1985, taxes and spending will likely be the top item on the political agenda for 1985 and even longer.

My basic view is that the overall direction of the Treasury plan is positive. I like the idea of replacing a system of special incentives with one in which the market would decide the best way to produce, and government would become more neutral in its impact on the economy. I have concerns that the plan may tend to promote consumption too much and investment too little. It does back off from the strategy of encouraging capital formation and production through tax incentives. Yet it probably allocates investment more efficiently, which could offset any decline in investment. The lower tax rates could provide more motivation for American workers. The plan changes so radically the way we tax ourselves that there would be a difficult transition and massive uncertainty during the long debate. In general, though, the proposal is a good starting point.●

THE U.N. AND THE U.S. CONTRIBUTION

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, in spite of the lofty and abundant expectations that accompanied the founding of the United Nations in 1945, that organization has failed in many ways to live up to its charter. Many Americans held out great hope that this organization would help to usher an era of peace, brotherhood, and tranquillity into the affairs of men and nations. But that has not been the case. The United Nations has been guilty, in recent years, of maintaining a hypocritical double standard at the expense of both the Western democracies and the U.N. charter. And this is being done here in our own country and with better than 25 percent of the total budget being provided by the United States.

At the very least, I think it is imperative that we reevaluate our financial contributions to that organization. A new contribution formula, one which would be fair to both the United States and other member nations, must be implemented. That is why I have introduced legislation to reduce our financial contribution from its disproportionately high 25 percent plus level to a more realistic 5.6 percent. The latter figure is arrived at by shifting the contribution formula from one based on national income to one based on the population of member nations. Such a move would force Communist and Third World countries to shoulder a more proportionate and hence fairer share of the U.N. budget.

If we continue to pay an unduly large share of the U.N. expenses each year while other nations pay relatively little, we can only expect an increase in the hypocrisy that has marked U.N. sessions in recent years. Criticism continues to be heaped on the United States and other Western democracies and we continue to pay for the right to listen to it. As one seasoned U.N. observer so aptly noted, "Now I don't like antidemocratic organizations, but I am prepared to accept their existence—so long as I don't have to pay for their fun and games."

I hope my colleagues will join me in introducing a new level of realism into our contribution to the United Nations by cosponsoring this piece of legislation.●

LIMITATION OF SHIPOWNER'S LIABILITY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a bill to clarify and update the limitation of liability laws applicable to shipowners.

The United States adopted its first maritime limitation of liability statute in 1851 as a device to protect our fledgling maritime industry when there was little, if any, insurance coverage available for most maritime endeavors. The law was also designed to place the American shipowner on an equal footing with his protected foreign competitors. The law has remained the same since 1851 except for a 1936 amendment that provided a post-accident fund of $60-a-gross-ton for personal injury and death claims. This amendment was the direct result of the Morro Castle disaster, which took 134 lives and left an estimated $20,000—the salvage value of the vessel—for distribution in settlement of all claims. Recently, Congress increased the limitation fund figure to $420-a-gross-ton. This, however, was intended to be an interim measure until we are able to enact a more complete revision of the law.

It is generally conceded that the existing law on the subject of limitation of liability is outmoded. This is particularly true when the present law is applied to a major marine disaster such as the total loss of a vessel like the Ocean Ranger, Poet, Marine Electric and, most recently, the drilling vessel Glomar Java Sea.

Many of the conditions in the shipping industry that inspired Congress to pass the 1851 statute no longer prevail. The trend in the case law has been to sharply restrict the granting of limitation. This is a recognition of the law's increasing obsolescence and unfairness toward injured parties.

The bill I am introducing was developed by the Maritime Law Association and is patterned after the "Convention on Limitation of Liability for Maritime Claims, 1976." This convention was not agreed to by the United States because the claims limits in it were too low. The bill I am introducing raises those limits considerably.

I understand that other proposals to amend the limitation of liability laws are being developed. While they may take a different approach, I believe we all have the same objective; namely, to provide a clearer basis in law for the settlement of maritime claims—one that will insure fair and proper compensation for seafarers and their families and one that will not put American shipowners at a competitive disadvantage.

I want to make it clear that I have not taken a position as to which approach is best designed to achieve the objectives I have outlined. We intend to have comprehensive hearings and afford all interested parties an opportunity to present their views.

There is no doubt that revision of the limitation of liability laws will be a challenge that is certain to raise controversy, but it is a challenge we intend to meet. I believe we will be able to arrive at an equitable solution that will insure full and fair compensation of those who may be injured or of those families who lose a loved one, without unduly burdening the competitiveness of our merchant marine.●

THE FEDERAL EMPLOYEE HEALTH BENEFITS REFORM ACT OF 1985

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, 25 years ago, Congress created the Federal Employee Health Benefits Program, a health insurance program intended to offer Federal employees, annuitants and their families protection comparable to that available to private sector employees.

Today more than ever, Federal workers need good insurance coverage to protect them from skyrocketing hospital and health care costs. Unfortunately, under 4 years of the Reagan administration, they have seen their health plan coverage diminish substantially. Federal workers now pay more for less coverage and do not have health benefits equivalent to those provided in the private sector. That is why I am introducing the Federal Employees Health Benefits Reform Act of 1985.

The FEHBP provides health insurance coverage for approximately 10 million Federal Government employees, annuitants and dependents. As the largest employer-sponsored health plan in the world, the FEHBP offers members choices from a range of plans with several varieties of benefits and premiums.

Regrettably, the Reagan administration in its first term saw fit to reduce and restructure the FEHBP to the detriment of Federal workers and retirees. In 4 years, the Office of Personnel Management [OPM] reduced health benefits by 15 percent and increased premiums almost 50 percent. It appears that the Reagan administration plans more of the same during the second term.

Because of our concern over the impact of the Reagan policies, the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee hired the firm of William M. Mercer to conduct a study comparing the FEHBP to private sector and State health plans. The Mercer report confirmed that, in the areas of reimbursement percentage and employee contributions, Federal employees are falling farther and farther behind their private sector counterparts. Overall, health plans available to Federal employees are of less value than plans sponsored by corporations and State governments that participated in the survey.

Another very recent study conducted by the Hay Associates for the Post Office and Civil Service Committee shows that Federal health benefits are now 2.2 percent less, as a percentage of pay, for the Federal employee than for the average private sector worker. This study confirms again that Federal workers do not receive health benefits equivalent to those provided to private sector employees.

As Chair of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits, I held extensive hearings during the last Congress on the many problems of the FEHBP. Through these hearings, we know what needs to be done to restore the FEHBP to its former, intended status. My bill will provide Federal employees, annuitants and dependents with a dependable, stable and comprehensive health insurance program.

The Federal Employee Health Benefits Reform Act of 1985 will amend current law to increase the Government's share of the premium contribution from 60 percent to 75 percent of the average subscription charge of the Big Six health plans. It will also increase to 100 percent the amount of that contribution which can be applied to a health plan. This would be the first increase in the Government's contribution in 10 years and is closer to what private employers pay toward health insurance coverage for their employees.

To ensure adequate health coverage for retirees, my legislation provides for a government differential, equal to 5 percent of the Big Six average, to be paid to the FEHBP for each enrolled employee or annuitant who is age 65 or older and is not entitled to part A hospital insurance under Medicare.

My legislation will also allow "riffed" Federal employees and certain others an opportunity to continue health coverage provided they pay the entire premium cost. It is important that employees separated through no fault of their own be protected against possible catastrophic medical costs.

The legislation also will require the OPM to establish financial solvency requirements for self-insured plans. This will eliminate the possibility of a plan becoming insolvent and unable to pay legitimate medical claims.

On the benefit side, my legislation requires fair, standardized alcoholism, drug rehabilitation, and mental health benefit levels for all FEHBP plans. Furthermore, it requires all plans to provide 50 outpatient visits and 60 inpatient visits, as well as two 28-day alcoholism treatment or rehabilitation benefits. The level of benefits, however, could be increased by approval of a peer review group on a case-by-case basis.

My legislation will also prohibit the OPM from contracting with an insurance carrier for health insurance that is not equivalent to 95 percent of the previous year's contract. In addition, it will require these plans to provide dental coverage.

Because of the OPM's many recent, unilateral policy changes which adversely affected thousands of the FEHBP subscribers, my legislation will mandate that the OPM conduct an open season of not less than 3 weeks when an adjustment is to be made to any rates or benefits for any old or new plan offered, or when an existing plan is to be terminated. It also requires the OPM to make available not later than 4 weeks before the start of open season information necessary for employees and annuitants to choose among the many different plans.

To ensure an end to past discriminatory practices, this bill will require all health plans to accept annuitants on an equal basis with active employees.

Finally, the Federal Employee Health Benefits Reform Act of 1985 reestablishes congressional oversight of this important health insurance program. Too often in the past OPM officials and the White House have been allowed to set premium rates and manipulate benefit levels without giving any thought to the harmful effects such changes would have on enrollees.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this legislation is the vehicle that will bring long-term stability and much needed reform to the Federal Employee Health Benefits Program. I urge my colleagues to enact this measure to guarantee Federal workers and retirees health insurance that is comparable to that provided by the private sector.●

RELEASE FEDERAL HIGHWAY MONEYS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would release $7.5 billion in highway funding. This Congress has already delayed too long on distributing moneys from the highway trust fund and it behooves us to act on this issue as soon as possible. Every day that we put this issue off, we get closer and closer to the beginning of the construction season and continued lost opportunities.

My legislation requires the immediate release of funds which failed to be allocated for 1985 and half of fiscal 1984. We must put aside differences which separate us on the various demonstration projects and act immediately for the good of the whole country on a clean ICE bill. Further delay is inexcusable when this funding is essential to the completion of our Interstate Highway System and the safety of our roads. Over 450,000 transportation construction industry jobs are currently being held hostage to the passage of an ICE.

In my own State of Wisconsin, 57 projects, amounting to $82 million, have been delayed. A share of these funds which have already been collected from the Wisconsin motorist and are currently just collecting dust in Washington. There is no justification for these funds not to be returned to their State of origin as originally planned. That is just what my bill would do. We in Wisconsin have a particular concern since our construction season is so short. It is necessary that we act now to make sure that these projects can be completed according to schedule.

I have met with the Governor of my State and we have agreed that a clean ICE is what is needed to suit Wisconsin and the country best. I have also been in communication with the other 49 Governors and from what I have heard, the need to release these funds is a top priority across the country. The Federal Highway Administrator, with whom I have also talked, has warned of the dire consequences of demonstration projects tying up the vital passage of the ICE.

Failure to allocate this funding could jeopardize our entire Interstate System and other links in our highway transportation system. This is a nationwide issue. It is imperative that approval of an interstate cost estimate be given top priority in this Congress. The cost of delay is enormous in terms of lost employment, infrastructure deterioration, inflation and total chaos within the highway costruction industry.

We must put an end to this national traffic jam. Action must be taken now and it must be decisive. These funds belong in the States where they can be put to work. It serves no purpose to collect 9 cents a gallon from gasoline users if those funds remain tied up in Washington. I predicted this would happen when we considered an increase in the gasoline tax—and that is why I voted against the bill. I was convinced that the Wisconsin taxpayer would not get his or her fair share. But that is ancient history now. Now we must release the tax dollars already collected—so they can go to work in our respective States. I hope an ICE will be approved quickly for the sake of the Nation.●

TRENDS IN HIGHER EDUCATION

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my "Washington Report" for Wednesday, November 7, 1984 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

TRENDS IN HIGHER EDUCATION

America's universities and colleges face many challenges today. Among the most difficult are a shrinking student-age population, the loss of many good professors because of low salaries and minimal job security, decaying buildings and outdated laboratories, state higher education programs crimped by recession, and cutbacks in federal aid to higher education during the first few years of the Reagan Administration. Our system of universities and colleges is considered to be one of the finest in the world. Its continued strength is vital to the continued strength of our nation. It will need help on a variety of levels if it is to remain strong.

The federal government traditionally has played a role in higher education. Indeed, Congress approves the expenditure of some $14 billion a year for that purpose. More than half of the money is used to aid students (especially those from low-income families), one third of it pays for research (especially in the areas of medicine and defense), and a small portion of it goes to meet the operational and instructional costs incurred by universities and colleges. In reality, 14% of the cost of higher education is covered by the federal government; 30% comes from the states, 21% from tuition, and 8% from private gifts and endowment. Over the past few decades, federal support of higher education has increased significantly, though the rate of growth dropped in the first years of the Reagan Administration.

Washington's role in higher education is secondary, but, as the figures just mentioned suggest, it is an important one. Concern that the role be performed effectively has caused Congress to rethink and rework federal higher education programs in recent years. Despite constraints on the total amount of federal aid that can be budgeted for higher education—constraints stemming primarily from the pressure of the deficit and the fear of excessive federal control—major changes are being made in these programs.

A number of trends are worth mentioning:

First, Congress is increasing the amount of money to be spent on student aid. This year's appropriation is 20% higher than last year's, a rise due partly to a recognition in Congress that student loans and grants were cut back too sharply in 1981, as well as to a rising demand for benefits among students entitled by law to receive them. The second point is an especially important one to take into account. In certain programs, such as the Guaranteed Student Loan Program, any student who meets the financial eligibility requirements gets the benefit, and the number of eligible families has been going up. The President wants to tighten up the eligibility requirements further than he has already, but that idea has been given a cool reception in Congress. However, Congress has gone along with initiatives to improve the collection of delinquent student loans, and it has approved legislation to permit the consolidation of loans and the extension of repayment periods to reduce defaults.

Second, while Congress continues its effort to increase the access of the disadvantaged to higher education, there is a growing feeling among legislators that programs to aid students should recognize academic achievement as well as financial need. The idea is to give students an added incentive to excel. Congress recently set up the Federal Merit Scholarship Program for high school graduates whose scholastic accomplishments have been outstanding.

Third, Congress is stepping up its drive to improve laboratories, computers, and libraries at institutions of higher education all across the nation. The problem, as just described by the National Science Foundation, is that some 25% of the equipment in top laboratories is obsolete. Such obsolescence harms instruction and research, compels professors to seek better opportunities in industry, and saps our scientific strength.

Fourth, Congress appears to support the idea that collaboration between private sector businesses and higher education will bring better instruction and a much-needed infusion of funds. In fact, one of the key trends in higher education is the rapidly increasing number of joint university-business projects. These range from agreements to market products resulting from research on campus, to campus-based "research parks" where college faculty and industry scientists work together to develop advanced technologies. Before Congress adjourned, it approved a proposal to provide funds to encourage partnerships between higher education and the private sector to improve instruction.

Fifth, Congress has begun to focus its attention on the academic disciplines that are particularly important to our country, such as science, mathematics, engineering, foreign language, Soviet studies, and the like. More fundamentally, our future depends on our ability to persuade able young men and women to enter the teaching profession. Congress just established a special scholarship for outstanding high school pupils who hope to become elementary and secondary school teachers.

Not all the trends in higher education are positive. A less encouraging trend is the increasing direct use of federal money to fund a particular university's project, whether it be a new library, laboratory, or learning center. Many of these projects are worthy, but there is a risk that widespread use of direct funding may shortcircuit the current process of open competition and peer review and lead to the creation of an academic "pork barrel" controlled by powerful Senators and Congressmen. A resolution was introduced this past session urging Congress to reaffirm its commitment to open competition and peer review.

American higher education has served the nation well, but it will take a concerted federal, state, and private effort to ensure that it continues to do so.●

NO FIRST USE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, there are many aspects of the national debate on arms control over which the American people disagree. About one issue, however, there is a clear consensus: the United States should not, in any conflict, be the first nation to use nuclear weapons. The League of Women Voters supports this view; the National Conference of Catholic Bishops has endorsed it; the Nuclear Weapons Freeze Campaign is in favor of it. Indeed, according to the Public Agenda Foundation, four out of every five Americans believe—mistakenly—that the United States has already adopted a policy of no-first-use.

Today I am reintroducing legislation that will bring American practice into conformity with this opinion. This joint resolution explicitly renounces the first use of nuclear weapons and calls upon the United States to conclude treaties with all nations similarly renouncing first use.

Adopting a policy of no-first-use is a concrete, practical step that will contribute to our national security by reducing the threat of nuclear war, strengthening relations with our allies, and improving the climate for arms control negotiations. As the United States and the Soviet Union develop more accurate and more powerful missiles, each side draws closer to a first-strike capability, and the danger of a preemptive nuclear attack grows. An explicit declaration of no-first-use would reassure our adversaries—and our friends—about our intentions.

As important as it is to avert a strategic first strike, the possible escalation of conventional wars poses an even more serious threat of nuclear holocaust. Contrary to popular belief, current NATO military doctrine calls for the early and extensive use of nuclear weapons in any conflict in Central Europe. While many Americans assume that the first use of nuclear weapons would be simply a warning shot, or perhaps an attack on massed Soviet forces deep within enemy territory, U.S. Army training manuals treat tactical nuclear weapons as just another source of firepower. One officer training film envisions the use of 136 tactical nuclear weapons in a single salvo, against targets as small as a group of six Soviet tanks. One-third of NATO's nuclear arsenal consists of short-range weapons that will explode within 10 miles of the point from which they are fired.

Such massive use of nuclear weapons would reduce to a cratered wasteland the very territory that we were trying to defend, and could very well result in a strategic nuclear exchange. As McGeorge Bundy, George Kennan, Robert McNamara, and Gerard Smith—officials who helped to shape American military policy under previous administrations—have observed, "the one clearly definable firebreak against the worldwide disaster of general nuclear war is the one that stands between all other kinds of conflict and any use whatsoever of nuclear weapons. To keep that firebreak wide and strong is in the deepest interest of all mankind."

These four men have also pointed to the unnecessary strain which is placed upon NATO by its reliance upon a strategy of first use. As the reaction to the deployment of Pershing II and cruise missiles demonstrates, our European allies are simultaneously afraid that we won't defend them with nuclear weapons, and afraid that we will. By shifting from a nuclear to a conventional deterrent against a conventional attack in Europe, we could remove the single most divisive element in the Atlantic alliance.

A pledge of no-first-use would reduce tensions with the Soviet Union, as well. In a few days, Secretary of State Shultz and Foreign Minister Gromyko will meet in Geneva to discuss the possible resumption of arms control negotiations. During the months to come, each side will be looking for a sign that the other's interest is genuine. An American renunciation of the first use of nuclear weapons would be such a sign and might lead to a climate in which significant reductions in nuclear arms are possible.

Nuclear weapons have not been used in battle since 1945. To ensure that they will never be used again, we must recognize that it makes no sense to hold these weapons for any purpose other than to deter a nuclear attack.

Joint resolution to renounce the first use of all nuclear weapons and to conclude treaties with all nations renouncing the first use of all nuclear weapons

Whereas the United States and the Soviet Union both have developed nuclear weaponry to retaliate to a nuclear attack with equal or even greater force;

Whereas this capability for retaliation has created a condition of mutual deterrence;

Whereas the delicate balance of mutual deterrence has provided a disincentive to actual nuclear warfare;

Whereas the United States and the Soviet Union both are moving toward development in both the strategic and tactical nuclear realms of first-use capabilities;

Whereas the increasing feasibility of the first-use option heightens tensions on both sides and undermines mutual deterrence;

Whereas continued pursuit and refinement of the first-use option will encourage preemptive nuclear attack;

Whereas exercise of the first-use option, whether tactical or strategic, will result in a full-scale nuclear exchange and the subsequent destruction of much of civilization;

Whereas the United States and all nations face no more solemn duty than preventing a nuclear cataclysm;

Whereas this duty can best be fulfilled by maintaining mutual deterrence at lower levels than currently exist, and by working toward the elimination of all nuclear weapons; and

Whereas renouncing the first use of all nuclear weapons is consonant with these obligations and aims: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the policy of the United States to renounce the first use of all nuclear weapons and to conclude treaties with all nations renouncing the first use of all nuclear weapons.●

POLITICAL FREEDOM FOR FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced the Federal Employees' Political Activities Act of 1985, modifying the Hatch Act by permitting Federal employees the right to participate voluntarily in political activities so long as those activities do not even appear to compromise the integrity of the merit system or the impartial administration of the functions of our Government.

Previous studies by the Congress have revealed not even the suggestion of any wrongdoing in Federal employees participating in political activity voluntarily and on their own time. The Hatch Act, well intended as it was, was enacted in a period during which the Congress was deeply concerned about the growth in the power and influence wielded by then-President Franklin Roosevelt. Times and conditions have changed since enactment of the Hatch Act in 1939. My legislation takes notice of these realities.

This bill is similar to the Postal Employees' Political Activities Act of 1985, which I also introduced today. I introduced two separate bills because, notwithstanding the different status of postal and Federal employees, they are ill advisedly treated as one and the same. The introduction of two separate bills recognizes that these two employee groups are separate and distinct and that the issue of full political participation for each group should not be confused.

This bill retains the principles of integrity, impartiality, and merit in our Federal personnel system.

The principal provisions of the bill are as follows:

Federal employees are encouraged to exercise their right of voluntary political participation.

The prohibitions of existing law employees in foreign intelligence positions, law enforcement, auditing, and contracting positions are retained.

Prohibits the use of official authority, influence or coercion with respect to the right to vote, not to vote, or to otherwise engage in political activity.

Prohibits solicitation of political contributions by superior officials and making or soliciting of political contributions in Government rooms or buildings.

Prohibits political activity while on official duty, in Federal buildings, or in uniform.

Requires that employees who seek elective office do so on their own time.

Permits State and local employees to seek elective office if they hold federally funded positions.

Designates the special counsel of the Merit System Protection Board [MSPB] as the enforcing authority and the MSPB as the adjudicatory authority.

Subjects violators to removal, suspension, or lesser penalties at the discretion of the Merit System Protection Board.

Requires the Office of Personnel Management [OPM] to report annually to the Congress.

My bill adds to and stregthens those meritorious features of the Hatch Act by providing employees and the public with greater protection against any resurgence of the spoils system. It updates those parts of the Hatch Act which are no longer applicable by permitting those voluntary, off-duty political activities which do not conclusively interfere with the impartial administration of effective public service.●

DEEPENING THE PORT OF GREEN BAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to introduce legislation to authorize the Army Corps of Engineers to deepen the Fox River channel in the Port of Green Bay from 24 to 27 feet.

In planning for increased import-export traffic, Green Bay Port officials and users recommend that the channel deepening is an essential step. With a harbor of 24 feet, Green Bay has been impeded in maximizing its maritime traffic with the 27-feet deep St. Lawrence Seaway. Foreign trade has become increasingly important to this Nation's economic health and Green Bay is no exception.

In 1983 a new international tonnage record was set in Green Bay. A total of 331,373 tons of overseas and Canadian cargo was handled. This surpassed the previous all time high by 33,517 tons. This is particularly impressive since our shipping season only runs from late March through early December. Imports arrived from, among other places, Sweden, Brazil, and Canada. We exported midwestern products all over the world, including such distant lands as Morocco, Peru, and India.

Domestic tonnage was up too, by 114,768 tons. Waterborne commerce through the Port of Green Bay in 1983 resulted in an economic impact on the Brown County area totaling over $32 million. When the figures are in for 1984, I am sure that we will see it has been another banner year.

Last year the Water Resources Subcommittee authorized a study by the corps to investigate the viability of deepening the harbor channel. Because the average corps project takes better than 20 years from start to finish, I believe it is essential that planning begin now for the future needs of Green Bay's port. I therefore urge the members of the Public Works and Transportation Committee to support this legislation and incorporate it in the fiscal 1986 water resources authorization legislation.●

OBSERVATIONS ON THE 1984 ELECTION: PART I

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, November 14, 1984, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

OBSERVATIONS ON THE 1984 ELECTION—PART I

This newsletter and the next contain my observations on the 1984 campaign and election.

Nineteen eighty-four was an ugly political year. The trend toward negative campaigning in our politics is unmistakable, and this campaign was the most negative that I can remember. All over the country, local races were punctuated by candidates' attacks on their opponents' integrity. Some races were so bad that they amounted to little more than lengthy bouts of name-calling. I suppose that negative campaigning is nothing new in America, but its extent today is disturbing. Gone, I fear, is the day when candidates did not mention their opponents by name. Campaign strategists appear eager to abandon the issues and focus on personalities. What really worries me about negative campaigning is that it seems to work. Its effects show up immediately in polls, and most experts say that it changes votes.

We should recognize the problem of negative campaigning and acknowledge the high price that we pay for it. Also, we should try to understand why it exists. The media encourage it by dwelling on superficial charges and counter-charges, showing their preference for flashy scandal over genuine substance. Politicians encourage it by failing to condemn it, or by indulging in it as an easy way to look good. The public encourages it by being uncritical and disengaged, believing all too readily anything bad about any politician and not wanting to go to the trouble of finding the truth. If there is an antidote to negative campaigning, it is likely to lie in the development of a new sense of propriety in public discourse, so that when a candidate strays out of bounds the public will penalize him for it.

I hope that I detected a strong reaction to special interest politics in 1984. We always will have some voters who are interested in a single topic to the exclusion of all others, who vote for or against a candidate on the basis of his position on one issue, and who simply do not see that in a democracy one's duty is to try to make broader judgments. Nonetheless, I was heartened by my contact with many constituents who reject special interest politics and who seek to broaden their point of view. These constituents are aware that the world is far too complex a place for candidates and voters with tunnel vision.

The campaign and election showed how strong factions have become in our politics. America is far more polarized now than it was a few years ago. Important differences always have existed to a degree, but it seems to me that the campaign did more to pull us apart than it did to bring us together. The electorate's alignment by income, race, and religion was apparent in the vote. Mr. Mondale appealed only to the poor and those concerned about poverty Mr. Reagan enjoyed broad support in the middle and upper classes. White voters went for Mr. Reagan by two to one, while nine of ten black and seven of ten Jewish voters sided with Mr. Mondale. Mr. Mondale banked on a revival of the old "New Deal" coalition of unions, ethnics, women, and minorities, but his hopes were unrealistic. Mr. Reagan ran extremely well among the young, although it remains to be seen whether the commitment is permanent. I would count the trend toward factionalism as one of the more discouraging in our politics. The question for America is, and always has been, whether we are one people or many. There was evidence in the election that we have become a divided, and therefore weakened, society, with each group out to get what it can at the expense of the others.

The campaign confirmed the dominant role of television among all the media. I have come to the view that one picture on the evening news is worth more in votes than scores, or even hundreds, of newspaper columns. In open recognition of this fact, the presidential candidates strove to put on a show for the television cameras each day. Mr. Reagan, who is an impressive performer, easily outdid Mr. Mondale, who is an indifferent, even poor, performer. Indeed, Mr. Reagan handled televised events, such as the Olympics and reunion of the D-Day veterans, with extraordinary skill. His command of television as a medium and his skill at image-making will be counted among the legacies of the Reagan Presidency.

Nothing about the campaign disturbed me more than the effort of the candidates to manage the news and to limit access to themselves. Mr. Reagan was especially aggressive in this regard. He went through the entire campaign without a news conference. His appearances were orchestrated down to the last detail. He always arrived and departed precisely on schedule. His advisers controlled the lighting and sound equipment for his appearances. Reporters were given fact sheets and other pre-packaged materials, but almost no chance whatever to question the President himself. They were permitted to shout a few questions from a distance during "photo opportunities," but even these questions had to cover certain subjects or else they were not answered.

Put me down as no fan of the presidential debates. The public seems to want them, and I suppose that they should (and will) continue for that reason alone. In fairness, it must be admitted that they do get people's attention—no small achievement these days! However, I do not believe that the debates made any substantive contribution to this year's campaign. All the candidates played fast and loose with the facts. The exaggerations, simplifications, and blunders made me shudder. Few people bothered to read the copious corrections appearing in the press the day after. The debates told us next to nothing about the candidates' qualifications for the Presidency. The country needs, above all else, judgment in the President, not debating skill or some undefined "presidential look." The winner of such a debate, when there is one, may not be the better man.

Chalk up one for the pollsters. The election of President Truman in 1948 always raises doubts about polls, but in 1984 the pollsters said time and again that the Reagan lead was insurmountable, and they were right. While it is true, as Mr. Mondale said, that "polls don't vote, people do," the poll has become a powerful factor in our politics, swaying politicians and voters alike.●

INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO EXTEND WAR RISK INSURANCE

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to extend the provisions of title XII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, relating to war risk insurance, for an additional 5 years, ending September 30, 1989. This title expired on September 30, 1984.

Title XII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, authorizes the Secretary of Transportation, with the approval of the President, to provide war risk and certain marine and liability insurance for protection of vessels, cargoes, and crew life and personal effects when commercial insurance cannot be obtained on reasonable terms and conditions. The purpose of title XII is to maintain the flow of U.S. waterborne commerce, including the maintenance of essential transportation services for the Department of Defense.

War risk insurance was provided by the Government in both World Wars I and II, and proved effective in protecting the civilian and military commerce of the United States, with total premium receipts in excess of losses paid. title XII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, was enacted at the outbreak of the Korean war in 1950. It was temporary legislation that would expire in 5 years. Congress has continued to extend the life of the title since then.

Government war risk insurance is necessary since commercial war risk insurance policies now in effect contain automatic termination clauses that cause insurance to terminate upon hostile detonation of a nuclear device of war or upon the outbreak of war—whether there is a declaration of war or not—between any of the following countries: United States of America, United Kingdom, or any other member of the British Commonwealth, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the People's Republic of China. Without Government war risk insurance, American vessels would be without protection against loss by risks of war after termination of the commercial policies. Ships and cargoes would not move without adequate insurance coverage.

The Maritime Administration in the Department of Transportation issues, for a fee, binders under which Government war risk insurance would attach immediately upon termination of commercial war risk insurance.

These binders give back-to-back coverage with the commercial policies and expire at the end of 30 days. At that time, premiums for the insured period would be fixed retroactively. Contracts for the ensuing period would be determined on the basis of the circumstances existing at that time.

An identical bill, H.R. 5505, was passed by the House on May 15, 1984 by a vote of 413 to 0. The Senate failed to act on the measure and it died with the adjournment of the 98th Congress.

Since authority for this program has expired, I intend to move expeditiously to insure enactment of the legislation early in this session.●

REAUTHORIZATION OF THE HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON HUNGER

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a resolution to continue the House Select Committee on Hunger for the 99th Congress. Last April the select committee was established by the overwhelming vote of 309 to 78. This body acknowledged the widespread existence and growing problem of hunger both here at home and abroad and took a stand by making the committee a reality.

I believe the need for the committee has not diminished. We still face hunger of great magnitude. Both our knowledge of the millions of persons living close to starvation and understanding of the complexities of ending hunger have grown in a few brief months. The committee can make an important contribution in the struggle against this human devastation.

The current African drought which affects as many as 150 million people has made the American people vividly aware of the devastation caused by hunger. The African crisis has raised public consciousness and underlined the need for an appropriate response. This horrifying famine, however, is only part of the hunger problem. Even without massive drought, approximately 15 million people die each year of hunger-related causes. As the select committee has found, this tragedy is largely preventable.

Hunger and malnutrition are also a reality in our own wealthy country. While conditions here at home are not as grave as in Africa, there is documentation which shows we are not doing all we can to assure adequate nutrition for all Americans.

The Nation's declining total infant mortality and low birth weight rates conceal much higher rates for the groups which are most vulnerable to hunger, specifically blacks, Hispanics, and migrants. For example, approximately 1 out of every 8 black infants is born at low birth weight compared to approximately 1 out of every 18 white infants; black infant mortality rates are nearly twice as high as white.

According to the most recent statistics, nearly one-fourth of the Nation's children live in poverty—25 percent of all preschool children and 21 percent of school-age children live in households with income below the official poverty line. Because the relationship between hunger and poverty is clear, it is important to monitor their nutrition intake to protect the children's health and the Nation's future interests.

An increased demand for emergency food assistance is also an indicator of hunger. A September 1984 report issued by the U.S. Conference of Mayors indicated that the demand for emergency food assistance has continued to increase during 1984. In the 83 cities—in 27 States—that responded to the Conference survey, it was found that existing services are unable to assist those requesting food aid. It is estimated in the report that on average, 25.1 percent of the demand for emergency food assistance is currently unmet. In addition, the cities anticipate that the demand for emergency food assistance will increase this year.

During its brief existence, the Select Committee on Hunger has investigated key aspects of the hunger problem in accordance with its mandate. As chairman of the committee, I am proud that these investigations have been conducted in a bipartisan fashion and have yielded valuable information.

Since the committee became operational in April, it has held hearings, briefings, and site visits in Washington, DC; Greenwood, MI; and San Francisco and Davis, CA. The committee has heard the views of some 100 experts in the field of hunger and malnutrition, Government officials, private sector leaders, and private citizens who experience inadequate food supply as a way of life.

As a result of our investigations, members of the committee have proposed specific measures to alleviate hunger—many of which have been adopted in whole or in part. Thus, the committee's work has already demonstrated a concrete effect. However, much remains to be done to investigate the complex problem of hunger and identify practical, cost-effective steps to reduce malnutrition and starvation.

The committee investigated emergency assistance to Africa. Members of the committee visited famine relief centers and port facilities in Ethiopia and met with Ethiopian Government leaders. Earlier, a joint hearing on the African crisis was held with the House Foreign Affairs Committee. The select committee has also been concerned with the underlying agricultural problems in that area of the world and initiated an Office of Technology Assessment study on appropriate agricultural technologies for sub-Saharan Africa.

The coexistence of hunger in Africa and elsewhere with massive U.S. agricultural surpluses led the committee to hold hearings on the use of these surpluses to combat hunger here and abroad. A private sector advisory board has been established by the committee to tap the expertise and experience of individuals in private enterprise particularly with regard to use of our agricultural abundance.

In its investigations and consultations, the committee found that a very large portion of the hunger-related deaths worldwide are caused by a vicious cycle of infection and malnutrition. This information gave rise to the Hall-Wolf bill which, due to the efforts of select committee members, other concerned Members of Congress, and nongovernmental groups, resulted in $60 million of additional health and nutrition assistance to people in developing countries. Using conservative estimates, this additional funding will save the lives of 170,000 people and save a comparable number of people from being crippled. It will also lead to increased economic productivity for hundreds of thousands of people.

The committee has been in the forefront in promoting practical steps to alleviate the African famine. Members of the committee, often in concert with other Members of Congress and antihunger organizations, have proposed a number of measures which were adopted. The efforts include diversion of food shipments on the high seas to meet urgent needs in Ethiopia, the release of 300,000 tons of reserve wheat to alleviate the food crisis, and the transfer of funds from the food aid sales program (Public Law 480, Title I) to the food aid donations program (title II).

The committee has also responded to numerous requests from other members for information about the African crisis and has encouraged private donations. For example, on our return from Ethiopia, Representative ROUKEMA, the ranking minority member on the committee, and I worked together successfully to encourage the pharmaceutical industry to donate badly needed medical supplies to save lives in Ethiopia.

In its study of hunger in the United States, the committee has focused on the availability and accessibility of Federal food programs. The committee worked with members of the House Agriculture Committee to respond adequately to hunger in the United States, soliciting support for H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984 which had the unanimous support from select committee members.

The Select Committee on Hunger has been economical in its operations; we expect to return over $90,000 of its 1984 budget. Given the committee's record of effectiveness in its preliminary work to date and the importance of the problem which the committee addresses, I believe there is an overwhelming case for continuing the Select Committee on Hunger in the 99th Congress.●

NATIONAL THEATRE WEEK, JUNE 2, 1985

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to invite my colleagues to cosponsor a resolution I am introducing today which will designate the week beginning June 2, 1985 as "National Theatre Week."

I am bringing this to the attention of my distinguished colleagues in order to address the large role the legitimate theater has played in the everyday life of our country. Many of our larger cities already know the large impact and important role the stage plays. What is not known is what part the theater has played in the growth of America.

It is a fact that, during his lifetime, George Washington was an avid supporter of the theatre, so much so that his support brought about the repeal of earlier Continental Congress resolutions of October 1778 banning theater altogether. The purpose was to prepare Americans for a period of hardship and austerity, but the resolutions failed miserably. In fact, more theatrical activity was engaged in than ever before. The performances may have been illegal; however, they boosted the morale of the troops and of the citizenry.

It has been my pleasure to introduce the commemorative legislation for the last 2 years. Again, this year I am introducing the House joint resolution to commemorate National Theatre Week and I invite my colleagues to cosponsor it as they have in the past.●

BEN AND BERTHA KLINGER CELEBRATE 50TH WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Members of the U.S. House of Representatives to join with me in congratulating Ben and Bertha Klinger of Flushing, NY, on the joyous occasion of their 50th wedding anniversary, February 16, 1985.

The Klingers have been active, caring members of the Queens County community for many years. Their dedicated service in the Elechester Jewish Center and throughout the neighborhood has made a real difference in the lives of many Queens residents.

Mr. Speaker, the Klingers have been consistently generous with their time and energy, and they've shown a rare commitment to making their community more than a place of residences—they've turned their community into a genuine family.

Ben and Bertha Klinger are involved in many vital areas of service, and their history of dedication goes back decades. Ben served as chancellor commander of the Knights of Pythias, Lodge 501, from 1940 to 1945. He was a 15-year member and captain of the Alhearn Democratic Club, a charter member and board member of the Stevenson Regular Democratic Club, and a member of the Golden Ring Seniors Club. Bertha is a long-time active member of the Sisterhood of Elechester Jewish Center, and Ben is the vice president of the Center's Men's Club.

Their 50th wedding anniversary is an event that will be celebrated by their son, Neal, their son and daughter-in-law, Allen and Gerri, their grandchildren, Richard and Michelle, and the many people in Queens who are a part of their lives.

Mr. Speaker, I am making this statement about the Klingers because their lives have made a statement of outreach to, and love for, their neighbors. As a working man in the milinary business, and then as an employee of the U.S. Postal Service, Ben Klinger could have been concerned solely with his own life and the needs of his family. Instead, he and Bertha have spent many years sharing their rich lives and their boundless energy with others, to the benefit of every resident of Queens County.

I would like to ask my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to take this moment to join me in congratulating the Klingers on their many contributions, and to celebrate with them the occasion of their 50th wedding anniversary.●

TRIBUTE TO MORRIS "MOE" G. GLATTER

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, this month, after almost 43 years of Federal service, Mr. Morris "Moe" G. Glatter of Reading, PA will retire from the Federal Aviation Administration. It is my honor to bring Mr. Glatter's accomplishments to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. Congress.

Mr. Glatter began his civil service career in the Civil Aeronautics Administration in Teterboro, NJ, where he was employed as an airways operations specialist. He also served at Idlewild International Airport, now J.F.K. International Airport, before transferring to the Reading Municipal Airport control tower in 1951. His position at this time was titled air traffic control specialist. During Moe's employment at the Reading Airport, he was instrumental in formulating and organizing early air traffic control procedures for the Reading air shows.

During Mr. Glatter's distinguished military and civil service career, he has been the recipient of many awards, among which include 15 letters of commendation, three special achievement awards, and the Federal Aviation Administration's We Point With Pride Award for heroism. He has also received the Man of the Year Award from the Shomrei Habrith Synagogue.

In recognition of his dedication and his contributions to the Federal Government, the Reading Airport and the air traffic system, I would like to add my commendation to Mr. Glatter and I know that my colleagues will join me in thanking him for his commitment and in extending to him and his wife, Mildred, our heartfelt congratulations on his retirement. Moe has left a deep imprint at the Reading Municipal Airport and thousands of people are better off because of his service. I want to wish him the very best in all his future endeavors.●

GREEN INTRODUCES BILL TO ELIMINATE SEX DISCRIMINATION IN THE UNITED STATES CODE

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, together with my colleague from New York [Mr. FISH] my colleague from Rhode Island [Mrs. SCHNEIDER], and my colleague from Maine [Mrs. SNOWE], I am introducing a bill which will revise or eliminate over 150 gender discrimination provisions of the United States Code. A companion bill was introduced in and unanimously passed by the other body in the 98th Congress and is being reintroduced in the Senate today.

I have had major concerns about the ramifications of the gender discrimination provisions within our laws for a long period. For this reason, I first introduced this legislation in the 97th Congress. The bill I am introducing today incorporates all of the provisions of the original version and, further, addresses approximately 50 additional references subsequently identified as discriminatory by the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice.

A large portion of the laws being amended involve the extension of family benefits in recognition that sex distinctions are obsolete, since women can be the primary wage earners and are no longer barred from entering certain career fields. In addition, inequities related to educational, training, and employment opportunities are covered, and unfair preferences to male family members and sex-based distinctions in definitions of criminal sexual activity are eliminated.

It is important to note, however, that this bill does not address every gender-based statute and purposely does not include sex references of a very controversial or highly technical nature. For example, the Selective Service and combat limitations found in title 10 and various statutes that require affirmative action on behalf of women are not addressed. These difficult issues need careful consideration and are more appropriately the subject of separate study and further action.

Although I sincerely believe that passage of this bill is extremely important and an essential step in ensuring equal treatment of women under the law, I do not feel that enactment will solve all the inequities women have faced in the past and continue to face each day. Additional legislative actions and attitudinal changes will be necessary to ensure equality.

In the 98th Congress, we made significant progress in our efforts to address economic inequities faced by women. Nonetheless, much work remains to be done to eliminate economic discrimination against women. Of equal importance is civil rights legislation and the ERA, which must remain high priorities on our agenda. This bill is not a substitute for these other measures; rather, it is one component of the package of changes needed to ensure equal treatment for women. I intend to continue my strong support for equal rights for women in all areas, so that we may eliminate sex discrimination entirely.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation attracted 86 cosponsors when introduced last year and was passed by unanimous consent in the Senate. It is supported by the Congressional Caucus for Women's Issues. This legislation transcends partisan politics, and I am confident that my House colleagues will agree that gender discriminatory laws can no longer be ignored, and join me in cosponsoring this important effort to eliminate unfair, unnecessary, and outdated sex distinctions in the United States Code.●

QUEENS CHILDREN'S PSYCHIATRIC CENTER COUNCIL CELEBRATES 15TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join with me in honoring the Queens Children's Psychiatric Center's Advisory Council, which will celebrate its 15th anniversary on January 11, 1985.

Mr. Speaker, the center's advisory council is a remarkable body of more than 100 professional mental-health personnel, community members, and parents. All are volunteers. They give their time and energy to fight for the health and well-being of troubled children who cannot fight for themselves.

The advisory council acts as a watchdog for the Psychiatric Center in Queens. Its members push for new mental-health programs, increased hospital staffing, and creative, caring approaches to healing disturbed children.

The effect of the council's diligence on the Queens County community is immeasurable. How many angry, explosive children would have resorted to crime without the programs the council researched, fought for, and nurtured? How many lonely, troubled children would have tragically taken their lives without the center's suicide-prevention programs?

The advisory council members have many reasons to celebrate on January 11. They have been a catalyst in restoring damaged lives to healthy ones. They have made it their business to extend a message of hope to parents bewildered by suffering children and to help those children climb out of their pain and enter life on a firmer footing.

The council's members are not simply concerned, they are active. They work in public schools and speak to community organizations and parent groups, to educate and arm adults to recognize and help children who are in pain.

Mr. Speaker, this group of dedicated volunteers deserves our thanks and our praise. I would like to ask my colleagues in the House of Representatives to take this moment now to celebrate with the council it 15th anniversary.●

THE RELEASE OF POPE SHENOUDA

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great joy that I rise to say a few words regarding the recent release of Pope Shenouda III. Several days ago, Egyptian President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak ended 3 years of banishment for Pope Shenouda, allowing him to resume his position as patriarch of the Christian Coptic Church. This action is, indeed, a most encouraging development for the millions of Coptic Christians throughout the world and for those who have worked so hard for the Pope's release.

In early September 1981, the Egyptian Government banished Pope Shenouda to a desert monastary on vague and unproven charges of inciting religious strife and seeking to become a political leader. This unjust and desperate action deprived Egypt's 6 million Coptic Christians, as well as 22 million Copts throughout the world, of their spiritual leader. In addition, this act, coupled with other examples of religious intolerance by the Government, resulted in heightened tensions and animosities among Egypt's religious communities and alienated many law-abiding and loyal Egyptian citizens from their Government.

I want to commend President Mubarak for reinstating the Pope. His action will certainly strengthen the process of democracy in Egypt and enhance the good relations between our two countries.

Since the 1981 banishment, the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations has actively worked to secure Pope Shenouda's release. I want to personally thank all the Members of this Chamber who have supported the subcommittee's efforts, which were begun by my predecessor Congressman Don Bonker, as well as those who have worked in their own way on the Pope's behalf. In addition, a special mention must go to the human rights community for all their valuable efforts in this regard.

I fervently hope that President Mubarak's action will influence other world leaders to observe basic human rights. Respecting fundamental freedoms and liberties, aside from being a moral imperative, can also serve as a source of strength for any government by engendering confidence and trust in a citizenry which hungers for fair treatment and justice.●

THE MINORITY TELECOMMUNICATIONS OWNERSHIP TAX ACT OF 1985

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing legislation to increase minority ownership opportunities in telecommunications. The Minority Telecommunications Ownership Tax Act of 1985 will broaden opportunities for minority ownership and involvement in the telecommunications industry by providing tax incentives to stimulate investment in minority firms and to encourage sales to minority buyers.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this bill, and to join in working for its passage this year.

At this point, I would like to insert in the RECORD a fact sheet and questions and answers that further describe this legislation.

Here follows that material:

MINORITY OWNERSHIP LEGISLATION: FACT SHEET

On December 2, 1982, the Federal Communications Commission adopted a number of items to increase minority ownership opportunities in telecommunications. These items included two legislative proposals to expand sources for financing increased minority ownership of broadcasting, cable, and common carrier properties:

1. INVESTMENT CREDIT AMENDMENT

The first legislative proposal amends § 48(c)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code to raise to a maximum of $500,000 the investment credit a taxpayer can claim against tax liability for purchase of qualified, used telecommunications property. This amendment would be triggered solely where the transfer of a telecommunications property would effectuate Commission policy, as when a minority-owned or controlled firm purchases directly, or through a limited partnership, an existing telecommunications property. Adoption of this amendment would allow increased investment credit only in those limited cases where ownership or control of a telecommunications property is transferred and the Commission certifies that the transfer effectuates its minority or other ownership policies such as those regarding cross-ownership. By allowing for a more substantial investment credit to be passed on to investors, this limited scale proposal will make the investment credit for purchase of used property a more effective financing tool for minority buyers to use in attracting investment capital to purchase operating telecommunications properties, especially existing cable television systems.

2. TAX CERTIFICATE AMENDMENT

The second legislative proposal amends § 1071(a) of the Internal Revenue Code which currently authorizes the FCC to grant tax certificates to sellers deferring taxation of their capital gains when they sell broadcast properties to minority buyers. Under this authority, the Commission since 1978 has granted 55 tax certificates to encourage minority ownership of broadcasting facilities. This figure represents over 30 percent of all commercial, minority-owned radio and television stations. The legislative proposal would amend § 1071(a) to authorize similar tax certificates for sales to minorities of expanding non-broadcast properties, including cellular radio, multipoint distribution systems, specialized mobile radio systems, and other private land mobile and common carrier systems.

A bipartisan FCC adopted these two legislative proposals on the recommendation of a distinguished advisory committee composed of leaders in finance and telecommunications and chaired by FCC Commissioner Henry M. Rivera. Charged with exploring ways of expanding financial sources for minority enterpreneurs, the Advisory Committee on Alternative Financing for Minority Opportunities in Telecommunications concluded that the lack of adequate financing remains the "single greatest obstacle" to minority ownership of telecommunications facilities. In a 55-page report released in May 1982, the advisory committee therefore recommended a number of financing mechanisms to ease minority entry into the telecommunicatioins marketplace, including the two legislative proposals.

The proposed legislation carries forward a long-standing FCC commitment to redress significant minority underrepresentation in the ownership of telecommunications properties. Although they constitute approximately 30 percent of the population, racial and ethnic minorities, as of November 1982, own less than 1.7 percent or 171 of the 10,134 commercial radio and television stations. They own approximately 20 cable television companies, which account for only 44 franchises in the country, less than one-third of one percent of the estimated 15,647 cable franchises. More limited data is available about minority ownership of radio common carriers. However, the extent of such ownership is believed to be negligible.

As tax incentive devices to stimulate investment in minority firms and to encourage sales to minority buyers, the investment credit and tax certificate legislative proposals should help:

Increase scarce equity capital for minority buyers;

Increase the number and diversity of telecommunications facilities available for minority purchase;

Encourage increased private sector investment in minority-owned business, in preference to government programs, loans or grants;

Expand minority job opportunities in telecommunications; and by creating more minority-owned firms and jobs,

Raise tax revenues through an expanded minority and national tax base.

Finally, the costs of the two legislative proposals are likely to be minimal and may be offset by possible revenue gains.

MINORITY OWNERSHIP LEGISLATION: QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

BACKGROUND

1. Q. What is the extent of minority ownership of telecommunications properties?

A. It is not extensive. Minorities are defined as "blacks, Hispanic, American Indian, Alaskan Native, Asian and Pacific Islander." See P.L. 97-259, "Communications Act Amendments of 1982", § 309(i)(3)(C)(ii). They constitute approximately 30 percent of the population yet they own less than 2% of the over 10,000 commercial radio and TV stations, less than one-third of one percent of the over 15,000 cable TV franchises, and a negligible amount of common carrier property.

2. Q. Why is minority ownership of telecommunications so low?

A. There are a number of reasons but a chief one and, according to an FCC advisory committee, "the single greatest obstacle" to minority ownership of telecommunications, is lack of adequate financing and investment capital.

3. Q. What has the FCC done to remedy this problem?

A. The FCC has long been concerned with the significant underrepresentation of minorities in the telecommunications marketplace. In 1978, for example, the Commission issued a Statement of Policy on Minority Ownership of Broadcasting Facilities, 68 FCC 2d 979 (1978). Pursuant to this policy statement, the FCC since 1978 has issued over 55 tax certificates to sellers of broadcast properties to minorities. These certificates defer taxation on the seller's capital gain, if any. Over 30% of current minority broadcast ownership has resulted from this policy.

Still concerned with the problem, the Commission, under Chairman Mark Fowler, established in September 1981 an Advisory Committee on Alternative Financing for Minority Opportunities in Telecommunications. The Committee, composed of distinguished leaders in finance and telecommunications, and chaired by FCC Commissioner Henry M. Rivera, was charged with recommending ways to increase sources for financing minority ownership of telecommunications facilities.

4. Q. What did the Advisory Committee recommend?

A. The Advisory Committee made a number of recommendations, including revisions of internal FCC policies and rules and two amendments to the Internal Revenue Code. None of these recommendations called for new government programs or increased government spending to finance the acquisition of telecommunications properties by minorities. Instead, the Advisory Committee recommended the pooling of existing private and public resources, increased managerial and technical assistance to minority entrepreneurs seeking to purchase telecommunications properties, and revisions of restrictive FCC policies and tax laws inhibiting minority acquisition of such properties.

5. Q. What action did the Commission take on these recommendations?

A. On December 2, 1982, the Commission adopted all of the Advisory Committee's recommendations, including two legislative proposals.

LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS

Investment tax credit amendment (26 U.S.C. § 48(c)(2))

1. Q. What is the Commission's investment tax credit proposal and what is it designed to accomplish?

A. The ITC proposal would raise in certain limited circumstances to a maximum amount of $500,000 the investment credit a taxpayer can claim against tax liability for purchase of qualified used telecommunications property. The proposal is designed primarily to facilitate minority access to investment capital for the purchase of existing telecommunications properties, especially small-to-medium size cable systems.

2. Q. Would the proposed amendment raise the used property limit across the board?

A. No. The ceiling would be increased only in those limited circumstances where ownership or control of a telecommunications property is transfered and the Commission certifies the transfer effectuates its minority or other ownership policies. By limiting the increase in the used property ceiling to such circumstances, the adverse impact on tax revenue would be precluded which would occur if this used property cost ceiling were raised across the board. Moreover, the proposed Commission certification is viewed as necessary in order to assure some kind of enabling device to trigger the ITC benefit mechanism for minority entrepreneurs.

3. Q. Why raise the limit only on "used" property?

A. First, there is no current limit on the value of "new" property for purposes of calculating the investment tax credit. Second, the emphasis on "used" property reflects findings of the Commission's Advisory Committee and the House Committee on Small Business that greater opportunity for minority ownership lies in the acquisition of existing telecommunications properties, especially of operating cable systems, rather than of new properties which requires greater financial, managerial and technical resources.

4. Q. How was the proposed $5 million limit selected?

A. The proposed $5 million ceiling on used property was selected because the ITC legislative proposal is designed primarily to facilitate minority purchase of small-to-medium size, existing cable television systems. With such systems on average selling from under $1 million to $10 million, the purchase price of such system, 50% of which typically can be allocated to tangible equipment assets, comes up to or under the $5 million ceiling. This figure is therefore sufficient in most cases to cover all ITC-eligible assets of small-to-medium size cable systems costing up to $10 million.

The ITC proposal will have a bigger relative effect on the minority purchase of cable rather than broadcasting or common carrier facilities because cable assets eligible for the ITC are on average a greater relative percentage of the purchase price than broadcast or common carrier assets are of their respective purchase prices.

Finally, raising the used property ceiling solely in these circumstances to a substantial amount such as $5 million, allowing a maximum 10% investment credit of $500,000, will more likely assure that an initiative designed to assist minority entrepreneurs gain access to capital and thereby gain entry to the telecommunications marketplace will succeed. For as the Advisory Committee noted, "there is a necessary correlation between a regulatory policy advocating increased minority ownership and the creation of meaningful incentives to promote that end." (Emphasis added)

5. Q What would be the costs of this ITC amendment?

A. The costs of the ITC legislative proposal would include the possible administrative costs the Commission might incur in the implementation of the proposed ITC certification process and the reduction of United States tax revenue. Administrative costs would result from staff salaries and any additional recordkeeping or reporting requirements necessitated by the proposed certification. Based on the Commission's experience with the tax certificate program to support minority broadcasting ownership, however, these costs would appear to be minimal and outweighed by the apparent benefits of the proposal.

The effect on tax revenues would also appear to be marginal as well as partly offset by a potentially larger revenue base among minority entrepreneurs (assuming the total national income would thereby be increased because of the proposal), and reduced net depreciation deductions explained in a briefing paper available from the Commission. In the words of the Advisory Committee report, the impact of the proposed change in the investment tax credit on the overall federal budget, "even if wildly successful, would be minimal."

A Commission cost estimate on the investment credit proposal; has found that if minority broadcast and cable ownership is increased to a total of 10% over a 10 year period, the annual cost in reduced tax revenues would be approximately $20 million a year, only $10 million if minority ownership increases to 5%.

1. Q. What is the Commission's tax certificate proposal and what is it designed to accomplish?

A. The tax certificate proposal would expand the FCC's existing statutory authority to grant sellers tax certificates deferring taxation on any capital gains from their sales when they sell broadcast properties to minority buyers. The proposed amendment would authorize the Commission to adopt a policy allowing tax certificates for sale of non-broadcast properties to minority buyers. These properties would include cellular radio, multipoint distribution systems, specialized mobile radio systems, and other private land mobile and common carrier systems.

2. Q. How effective has the Commission's current tax certificate authority been in increasing minority ownership of broadcasting facilities?

A. Very effective. Since 1978, for example, when it issued a policy statement pursuant to its tax certificate authority, encouraging minority ownership of broadcasting facilities, the Commission has granted 55 tax certificates representing over 30 percent of all minority-owned commercial radio and TV stations.

3. Q. Why is it necessary to amend § 1071(a) so that the Commission may grant tax certificates for sales of non-broadcast properties to minority buyers?

A. It is necessary because § 1071(a) as currently worded restricts Commission authority to issue tax certificates solely for sale to minorities of broadcast and ancillary services such as cable television systems which retransmit broadcast signals.

4. Q. Why is the proposed tax certificate amendment worded so as to affect "ownership and control of systems of communication by wire or radio (including policies promoting diversification of ownership of such systems)"?

A. By using the term "wire or radio", the amended § 1071(a) would authorize the Commission to adopt a policy statement allowing tax certificates for sale of non-broadcast "wire" systems of communications, as well as broadcast "radio" systems, including over-the-air radio and television and ancillary cable television systems. Authorizing the FCC to adopt policies "promoting diversification of ownership" of non-broadcast telecommunication facilities as an end in and of itself is necessary because the Commission's minority ownership initiatives to date have been premised on the jurisdictional nexus between diversity of ownership and diversity of available viewpoints. Thus, they have run only to broadcast and cable television facilities where such a nexus exists rather than to common carrier facilities where such a nexus is not present. The amending language is therefore viewed to be necessary since it is the Commission's judgment that the adoption of policies designed to increase minority ownership in the absence of any nexus with program diversity would exceed current FCC jurisdiction under the Communications Act of 1934. See in this regard National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Federal Power Commission, 425 U.S. 662 (1979).

5. Q. What would be the costs of this tax certificate amendment?

A. As with the costs of the proposed investment credit amendment, the costs of the tax certificate amendment would likely be minimal. For example, the FCC has documented that its costs for administration of the current tax certificate program for broadcasting facilities have been very marginal. Moreover, the tax certificate authority only authorizes a deferral, not elimination, of taxes on the seller's capital gain. Any cost to the Treasury incurred as a result of the proposed tax certificate amendment could thus be minimized and offset by ultimate tax revenues realized on the seller's capital gain.●

TENANT TAX EQUITY LEGISLATION

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, it is clear that one of the major tasks before the 99th Congress as we convene today is to reform the current Tax Code in an effort to make our tax system more equitable. A major example of discrimination in the Internal Revenue Code is that homeowners are allowed to deduct real estate taxes and mortgage interest paid during the taxable year in determining their taxable income, but renters, who pay a portion of the local and/or State real estate taxes indirectly through rent, are not allowed to receive any tax benefits for having paid their proportionate share of the same expenses allowed to homeowners.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Tenant Tax Equity Act of 1985—legislation that would correct that inequity by amending the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to permit tenants to take a tax deduction for real estate taxes they now pay indirectly through their rent. If State or local law provides that the landlord is the real estate collection agent for his tenants, then this legislation would allow the deduction "above the line", that is, as a deduction from gross income in determining adjusted gross income as opposed to itemizing the deduction. This would benefit those tenants who do not itemize their deductions as well as those who do.

Passage of the Tenant Tax Equity Act of 1985 would make our current tax system more equitable for a greater number of taxpayers. For example, the Tenant Tax Equity Act of 1985 would reduce the tax burden on low-income taxpayers. According to the Department of Housing and Urban Development, in 1983 over two-thirds of all household rental units were occupied by families with incomes of under $20,000. Clearly, passage of this legislation would be a welcome relief to these low- and middle-income taxpayers.

In addition, passage of this legislation would enable individuals to decide whether to purchase or rent housing without any undue economic bias. The current preferential tax treatment of homeowners distorts the individual's choice between buying a home or renting housing. This bias constitutes clear interference with economic efficiency.

These advantages would make it easier for individuals to live in rental housing and, to some degree, mitigate the need for housing subsidies. Just as important, the correction of this inequity would help stem the flight of families to the suburbs—a trend which is responsible, in part, for the economic deterioration of our major urban centers.

I urge the Committee on Ways and Means to hold hearings on the Tenant Tax Equity Act of 1985 as soon as possible, and I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this important legislation.●

IN HONOR OF NEW YORK TIMES REPORTER PETER KIHSS

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to join with me in honoring the late Peter Kihss, who was a reporter for the New York Times and other news organizations for nearly 50 years.

Mr. Kihss, a resident of Jamaica Estates, Queens County, who retired in 1982, died on December 28, 1984 at the age of 72. He was held in high esteem by his colleagues and by New York residents for his accurate and insightful articles on breaking events, and his thoughtful profiles of everyday people.

Throughout his long and successful career as a journalist, Mr. Kihss provided New Yorkers with a vital service. His comprehensive and analytic stories gave us insight and clarity about issues in New York that deeply affected our lives.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Kihss was a man who wielded the power of his pen to sketch the lives of the poor, the downtrodden and the powerful. New York readers depended on his accuracy, his understanding and his flair for color to make complicated issues clear and to make unfamiliar people a part of their lives.

The New York Times and the citizens have lost a powerful and vibrant writer who touched the lives of millions of people. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues now to join me now in paying tribute to Mr. Peter Kihss.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Kihss' obituary from the New York Times follows:

PETER KIHSS, REPORTER FOR 49 YEARS, IS DEAD AT 72

(By Robert D. McFadden)

Peter Kihss, a reporter for The New York Times and other news organizations for nearly half a century until his retirement in 1982, died of a heart attack Friday night at his home in Jamaica Estates, Queens. He was 72 years old.

Mr. Kihss often uncovered human dramas behind drab welfare statistics and ponderous government reports. Many of his best stories focused on people: immigrants, the poor, sooty firefighters, people snared in webs of bureaucracy and the personalities behind the masks of politicians and celebrities.

But he wrote dispassionately about a wide range of topics—state and city government, elections, transportation, education, labor, newspapers, utilities, crime, civil liberties, Communist and Nazi political affairs, the weather and other subjects.

On the night of Nov. 9, 1965, moments after a huge power failure plunged the Northeast into darkness, an assistant metropolitan editor of The New York Times—candle in hand—groped his way through the newspaper's darkened newsroom.

ANALYSIS AND DRAMA

"Peter," he called. "Peter."

In the face of crisis, it seemed only right for the editor to call on Peter Kihss, his best reporter, to do the story.

It was a monumental task of news gathering and writing, done by flickering candlelight, in a maelstrom of excitement and newsroom confusion and under crushing deadline pressure. But by morning, the readers of 850,000 copies of the paper were poring over an astonishingly comprehensive, analytic and dramatic account of the blackout.

It was a typically distinguished Peter Kihss performance.

In a career that began in 1933, he worked for The Associated Press, The Washington Post, The New York World-Telegram, The New York Herald Tribune and, for 30 years until his retirement on Aug. 31, 1982, The Times. For each employer, he covered stories with a grasp and an eye for color and detail that awed competitors and colleagues alike.

TRIBUTE FROM AN EDITOR

He was, by nearly every standard of American journalism, an ideal reporter: thorough, fast, tenacious and objective, with an encyclopedic memory, voluminous contacts and the ability to write with speed, grace and a towering calm against a deadline.

Arthur Gelb, now the deputy managing editor of The Times, said yesterday: "I always felt reassured, as metropolitan editor, to look up and see Peter Kihss at his front-row desk, ace reporter of the metropolitan staff. I knew that no matter what story broke during the turbulent 60's and 70's, however complex or close to deadline, I could ask him to cover it and that he would turn in a lucid, comprehensive account. Peter was the master of accurate, fair, balanced, thorough, detailed reporting under pressure."

Early in his career, Mr. Kihss was a foreign correspondent in South America, and he later covered school-integration battles in the South and breaking news for The Times in various parts of the country. But he was most at home in New York as a general-assignment reporter covering urban riots and plane crashes, the hoopla of parades and politics and the intricacies of nuclear power and municipal budgets.

As a World-Telegram reporter during the administration of Fiorello H. La Guardia, Mr. Kihss was often sent to City Hall when the paper had what he called "a nasty story on which to query the Mayor."

"The paper didn't want to waste its regular City Hall man, whoever he might be, by getting the Mayor riled at him," Mr. Kihss once recalled. "It got to the point that whenever Mayor La Guardia saw me, he got the idea there was going to be trouble somehow in the World-Telegram."

'THAT'S WHY I'M ASKING'

One day, Mr. Kihss confronted the pugnacious Mayor on the steps of City Hall and asked why he had helped a former city official get back on the municipal payroll to qualify for a pension.

The Mayor flew into a rage. "I'm going to throw you right down the steps," he shouted, grabbing Mr. Kihss's arm.

"Mr. Mayor," he roared back, "I don't care what you say. Four hundred thousand readers of The World-Telegram want to know, and that's why I'm asking."

"There was a sudden silence," Mr. Kihss recalled. "I realized I had seized the stocky little Mayor and lifted him right up into the air. I put him down—gently—and went quietly into Room 9," he said, referring to the City Hall press room. Later, the Mayor and Mr. Kihss met and laid the incident to rest.

CONFRONTATION IN ALABAMA

Some years later, Mr. Kihss found himself face to face with another kind of anger—a hostile crowd in Tuscaloosa, Ala., where he had gone to cover the enrollment of Autherine Lucy as the first black in the 125-year history of the University of Alabama.

Eggs were hurled, and some struck Mr. Kihss, who whirled to confront the mob. "If anybody wants to start something now," he shouted, "let's go."

Nobody moved.

For decades, he was an active member of the New York Newspaper Guild and various journalistic organizations, and he often wrote for their publications and spoke at their meetings. A tall, stoop-shouldered, baldish man with a nimbus of gray hair, he looked more like an Old World clockmaker than one of the nation's most distinguished reporters.

Peter Frederick Kihss was born in Brooklyn, the son of Latvian immigrants.

WINNER OF MANY AWARDS

In 1933, after graduating from Columbia University and working briefly with The Associated Press in Washington, he was a Pulitzer scholar and part-time correspondent for The Times in Uruguay and Argentina for a year. He became a reporter for The Washington Post in 1934, joined The World-Telegram in 1936 and switched to The Herald Tribune in 1943, primarily covering the United Nations. He joined The Times on Jan. 6, 1952.

Mr. Kihss won many awards over the years, from the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism; Sigma Delta Chi, the society of journalists; the New York Newspaper Guild; the Society of Silurians; the New York Press Club, and others. He was nominated for Pulitzer Prizes on four occasions.

This year, the Fund for the City of New York established the Peter Kihss Award for outstanding reporting on the city government and named Mr. Kihss the first recipient of the $5,000 annual prize.

THE 98TH CONGRESS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, October 24, 1984, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE 98TH CONGRESS

The record of the 98th Congress was uneven. It was a congress of bickering and division, with major accomplishments but few grand achievements. It put off several hard choices for next year. It will not be remembered as an especially productive congress; indeed, it may not be a particularly memorable congress at all.

The 98th Congress stuck to the general course laid out by President Reagan more than three years ago, including a military buildup and a tight rein on domestic programs, especially the means-tested ones. It strayed from that course somewhat, however, balking at further cuts in domestic spending and slowing the rate of growth of the military budget. Also, it rejected all of the President's proposed constitutional amendments, including those for a balanced budget, school prayer, and a line-item veto, and against abortion and busing.

The 98th Congress did produce some major legislative successes. The two most important were a bipartisan reform of social security and a budgetary compromise which cut $150 billion from the deficit over the next three years. Other important successes included a fundamental reform of methods of reimbursement to curb cost increases under medicare, a timely countercyclical jobs bill, and passage of a major measure overhauling federal criminal laws.

In addition, the 98th Congress can boast of a series of solid, if more modest, achievements. In the area of education, Congress restored some funds that had been cut too much in prior years. Also, it gave student religious groups equal access to facilities at public high schools, provided money to upgrade instruction in science and mathematics, and made new educational benefits available to veterans. Congress rescinded some excessive cuts in the area of health care as well. Furthermore, it mandated stronger warnings on cigarette packages, put a 15-month freeze on physicians' fees under medicare, and acted to promote the use of low-cost generic drugs. In the area of social services, Congress passed a bill to require that child support be withheld from parents' wages if not paid on time. Also, it expanded initiatives dealing with child abuse, channeled more money into nutrition programs, and established new subsidies for elderly part-time workers. Law enforcement was on Congress's mind when it took a tougher stance against child pornography. It encouraged states to raise the drinking age, restructured the bankruptcy system, and made tampering with consumer products a federal crime.

Other major tasks completed by the 98th Congress should be detailed. Congress showed its concern about discrimination through legislation guaranteeing women equal treatment in connection with pensions. Also, it agreed to study comparability of pay, made voting easier for the elderly and handicapped, and created a federal holiday to honor the birth of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Farmers were affected by an agricultural price-support freeze and expanded programs of federal assistance. A renewal of general revenue sharing and new federal standards for municipal regulation of cable television were of interest to local government. Social security beneficiaries were affected by an upcoming cost-of-living adjustment of at least 3% and fairer guidelines for review of eligibility under the disability program. Beyond these actions, Congress added more wilderness to the nation's natural preserves, passed a non-protectionist trade bill, called on the President to bring American marines out of Lebanon, begun reforming the Pentagon's procurement policies, and promoted mortgage-backed securities to make more money available to homebuyers.

Not everything that the 98th Congress did was positive, however. It failed to pass or chose to defer many worthwhile initiatives. Among them were a larger deficit-reduction bill, a revision of our immigration laws, a reversal of a Supreme Court decision that narrowed coverage of anti-discrimination laws, additional funds to repair highways and clean up hazardous wastes, a natural gas reform bill, measures to abate acid rain, restrictions on the export of strategic goods, and banking deregulation. Congress even went so far as to schedule votes on the MX missile and aid to the anti-government rebels in Nicaragua for early spring. Also, there was a serious breakdown of the budgetary process as disputes led to deadlock on nine out of the 13 regular appropriations bills. The result was the last-minute need to pass a massive $470-billion continuing resolution representing 85% of the total sum appropriated for the upcoming fiscal year.

There were several reasons for the shortcomings of the 98th Congress. It ended in the heat of a presidential election, and such congresses are not characterized by dynamism. The Senate and the House of Representatives were under the control of different parties, the Democrats regaining effective control of the House after the 1982 elections. There was often little presidential direction as the agenda-setting function of government shifted from the Oval Office to the Senate to the House, and then back again. There was increased partisanship and a tendency on both sides of the aisle to bring up measures to embarrass the other party. The glaring defects in basic congressional procedures became apparent when the budgetary process faltered and collapsed and the filibuster repeatedly tied the Senate in knots. Members were increasingly hesitant to act as they became more worried about the consequences huge deficits. Senate and House leaders found themselves increasingly unable to get legislators to vote the party line, as past congressional reforms continued to erode the leadership's power. More fundamentally, the 98th Congress to a large extent mirrored the lack of consensus in the country: it weaved and waffled because it frequently was unable to determine what constituents wanted.

The 98th Congress was a fractious one torn between its allegiance to the President and its desire to defy him. It often followed success with failure, cooperation with confrontation. It did many things, but it missed many opportunities.●

FLIGHT SAFETY COULD BE BETTER—WHAT ARE THE PROBLEMS?

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, for several months the number of airplane collisions, near misses and accidents have become a too frequent occurrence. This past summer, 17 persons were killed in a midair collision in San Luis Obispo, CA, and later, in August a jetliner with 146 people aboard narrowly missed colliding with a small plane over northern Virginia. More recently, a Brazilian-made Provincetown-Boston Airline plane crashed in Florida, killing all 13 aboard. Stemming from this evidence, there is obvious and pertinent room for improvement in air safety.

Today, I am introducing a joint resolution calling upon the Department of Transportation to investigate and identify the possible causes of these accidents, and present its findings to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate within 60 days.

The United States has had a tradition of safe and efficient air travel, yet critical problems exist. In 1984 there were 104 reported airplane accidents, which have fatally or seriously injured over 100 people. Additionally there have been many incidents of "near misses" which are not included in these statistics. The figures are too high and the potential danger too critical to ignore.

The complexities involved in our Nation's air control system are so great that it is difficult to identify the factor or combination of factors that may be contributing to the recent accidents and near accidents. Is there a need for additional radar and warning in small planes? How adequate is the computer equipment used in control towers, and are existing regulations associated with small planes being enforced? Are penalties enforced? Is training and testing of flight crews sufficient? These questions need to be dealt with immediately.

I do not have the answers to our air safety crises, but I know that it is imperative that they be solved.●

THE DELAWARE RIVER LAND ACQUISITION ACT

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address the concerns of many of my constituents in the Upper Delaware Valley of Sullivan County, NY.

The National Parks and Recreation Act of 1978 (P.L. 95-625) added a segment of the Delaware River, known as the Upper Delaware, to the Wild and Scenic Rivers System. The original enactment of the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act of 1968 (P.L. 90-542) was a significant departure from previous Federal efforts to protect areas of the United States that are landscapes that represent valuable natural resources. Instead of encouraging the outright acquisition of private land, alternative land protection techniques were proposed—that is, scenic easements.

While the original Wild and Scenic Rivers Act provides means for the protection of individual property rights in establishing wild and scenic river areas, the addition of the Upper Delaware to the Wild and Scenic Rivers System was accompanied by even more extensive safeguards. Section 704 of Public Law 95-625 provided for the minimum of Federal intervention, leaving the bulk of the responsibility for implementing the intent of the legislation—to preserve the river valley in its natural and free-flowing state—to the local authorities.

While the laudable intent of the legislation was clear, many of the area residents voiced vehement objection to the discretionary authority granted the Secretary of Interior. Reports of abuses by the National Park Service in other areas heightened concern.

At the time of inclusion of the Upper Delaware in the Wild and Scenic Rivers System, I represented a small part of the proposed corridor within the county of Orange. Since that time, my constituency along the Upper Delaware has increased to include the towns of Lumberland, Highland, Tusten, Cochecton, and Delaware in Sullivan County, NY. As the number of my constituents affected has increased, so has comments from residents expressing their sincere fears. They fear the arbitrary exercise of the Park Service's authority to condemn land in the Upper Delaware in the event that local plans, laws, and ordinances, or amendments thereto or variances therefrom, are found by the Secretary not to be in conformance with the guidelines or the management plan.

The bill I propose today, will remove the National Park Service, acting on behalf of the Secretary of the Interior, as the final authority in cases of condemnation in the Upper Delaware Wild and Scenic River. The original draft management plan which was developed by the Department of the Interior, was written by individuals in Denver, CO. While these did visit the region, their knowledge of the area and feeling for local concerns was severely lacking.

While more recent efforts to draft the legislatively mandated management plan has solicited far greater resident input, the sword of damocles remains above the heads of my constituents. The legacy of valley residents deserves far better protection than good intentions. The threat which was created by legislation can only be fully eliminated by legislation. Accordingly, I ask my colleagues to support this important measure, and am inserting the full text of this bill at this point in the RECORD for my colleagues review:

H.R. 108

A bill to prohibit the acquisition of certain lands in the Upper Delaware River without express prior Congressional authorization

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, Section 704 of the National Parks and Recreation Act of 1978 (P.L. 95-625) is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(k) Prior to acquiring any lands or interest in lands for purposes of the segment of the Upper Delaware River designated under section 3(a)(19) of the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act (whether such acquisition is under any provision of this section, under any provision of the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act, or under any other authority of law), the Secretary shall notify the appropriate committees of the Congress. Lands or interests in lands may be acquired for purposes of such designated segment without the consent of the owner thereof only if the Congress, following receipt of notice under the preceding sentence, adopts legislation expressly authorizing the Secretary to acquire such lands or interests in lands and specifically appropriates funds for such purposes.".

(b) Section 704(e)(4) of such Act is amended by inserting ", subject to subsection (k)," immediately after "the Secretary is hereby authorized".●

SALUTE TO "BROADWAY" CHARLEY WAGNER

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. Congress the outstanding achievements of "Broadway" Charley Wagner, a longtime Boston Red Sox scout from Reading, PA who will be honored for nearly 50 years of service to baseball at a testimonial dinner Sunday, January 13. Mr. Wagner signed with the Red Sox as a pitcher and was sent to Charlotte, NC in the Piedmont League in 1935. He has been associated with the Red Sox organization since that time.

Mr. Wagner won 20 games in his second season of professional baseball. In 1937 he won 20 games with Minneapolis of the class AAA American Association, and spent most of the next 4 seasons in AAA before going to the Red Sox in 1941. In 6 years of major league pitching, Wagner compiled a 32-23 record and 3.91 earned run average. Mr. Wagner enlisted in the Navy in 1942 and returned in 1946 to the Red Sox. At the close of his pitching career, he was signed as an assistant to the club's director for minor league operations. Mr. Wagner has served with the Red Sox since that time in a variety of positions, including the position of Red Sox pitching coach.

Charley Wagner is an outstanding example of dedication and excellence. He has left a lasting imprint on the Boston Red Sox and indeed the sport of baseball and I know that he will continue his commitment to America's favorite pastime. I urge my colleagues to join me in saluting this fine athlete and exemplary scout. I wish him the very best with the Red Sox and indeed all his future endeavors. Mr. Wagner has enriched the lives of all who have been privileged to know him and to work with him.●

LIFELINE SERVICES TELEPHONE ACT OF 1985

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, today, in conjunction with my good friends and colleagues ED MARKEY, JOHN BRYANT, and CARDISS COLLINS, I am introducing legislation which reaffirms our national commitment to universal availability of affordable telephone service for all Americans.

We are in the midst of a dramatic change in the telecommunications industry, and the way the industry responds to the needs of the marketplace. These changes, in all likelihood, will impact significantly the cost of telephone service to residential customers.

With these dramatic changes occurring in the telecommunications marketplace, it is the responsibility of Congress to ensure that our Nation's historic commitment to universal telephone service is not abandoned. For that reason, I am introducing today legislation requiring State public utility commissions to establish special lifeline rates for providing local telephone service at a discounted rate for low-income residential customers.

The legislation defines lifeline telephone service as basic telephone service intended to include a limited number of calls in the local exchange area, with a per call charge for additional calls. Lifeline service, however, may not include what is now commonly referred to as measured or budget service, where telephone charges are based on the number, distance, and duration of time spent on telephone calls. Lifeline service would be available only for a person's principal residence.

Under the legislation, State regulatory commissions are given the flexibilty to develop rates and eligibility criteria for the lifeline service in accordance with local needs and requirements. In developing eligibility requirements, however, State commissions are directed to pay particular attention to those most in need of assistance: the elderly, the poor, the handicapped, and the unemployed.

In addition, the legislation makes all qualified exchange carriers who provide lifeline telephone service eligible for payments from a lifeline service fund to defray the cost of the service. A qualified exchange carrier would receive compensation from the fund equal to 50 percent of the difference between the rate for lifeline service and the cost of providing such service.

The ability to communicate is, just as food, clothing, and shelter are, one of the most essential necessities of life. The telephone keeps us in touch with family and friends across town and across the country, and enables us to become an active participant in the community in which we live. In many cases, particularly for the elderly and disabled, the telephone is truly a lifeline to the outside world. And for most of us, the telephone is the principal communications link to local authorities in case of emergency.

However, upward pressure on local telephone rates threatens to deprive many of the elderly and the poor of basic telephone service, isolating them from friends and their communities. Congress must address this issue to ensure that every American will continue to received affordable telephone service. This legislation will ensure that those most in need of assistance, the elderly, the poor, the handicapped, and the unemployed, are not forced off the telephone network.

Mr. Speaker, today I also am introducing a resolution expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that the Federal Communications Commission, in conjunction with State regulatory commissions, should develop a lifeline service plan to ensure the continued availability of affordable telephone service.

I urge my colleagues to join me as cosponsors of the Lifeline Telephone Services Act of 1985 and the sense-of-the-House resolution.●

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS RESOLUTION

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring your attention to an outstanding resolution recently passed at the 85th National Convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. The resolution expresses the sentiment of the VFW members concerning the tragic and devastating internment of Japanese Americans in this country during World War II.

This resolution, No. 442, was presented by past commander in chief, Joseph A. Screrra, chairman, Committee on National Security and Foreign Affairs, at the Veterans of Foreign Wars, 85th National Convention, Chicago, IL, August 21, 1984. The resolution was approved and adopted by the delegates to the national convention.

It is particularly fitting that this resolution be presented to the House since today our distinguished majority leader, Mr. JIM WRIGHT, has introduced legislation to provide redress and reparations to those Japanese Americans who were deprived of their liberties. The number of the legislation, H.R. 442, was chosen to honor the highly decorated 442d Regimental Combat Unit, the all Japanese American fighting unit of World War II.

Just as the valiant members of the VFW have protected democracy and our liberty abroad, so do they continue their efforts to protect our precious system of constitutional rights and liberties at home. I would like to commend these individuals for their valiant work and hereby present their resolution for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES—RESOLUTION NO. 442

Whereas during the early days of World War II with the cloud of suspicion hanging over them, 120,000 Americans of Japanese descent on the West Coast were by force removed from their homes under armed guards of the United States and held in incarceration for the duration of hostilities in detention camps; and

Whereas there was not a single documented act of espionage, sabotage or fifth column activity committed by an American citizen of Japanese ancestry or by a resident Japanese alien on the West Coast before, during, or after the internment; and

Whereas to set forth the principles against a recurrence of such a tragedy of human rights, to uphold the ideals of what this nation fought for and that the rights of citizenship in no way depend on race or ancestry; and

Whereas in a demonstration of loyalty, Americans of Japanese descent petitioned in 1942 for the right to serve their country and have the opportunity to fight along with fellow Americans on both fronts and served with distinction and valor in the 442nd Regimental Combat Team in Europe, in the Military Intelligence units in the Pacific, and elsewhere, more than 30,000 American Japanese bore arms in defense of our freedoms, shedding their blood on such far-flung battlefields as the Arno and Bruyeres, Guadalcanal, and Iwo Jima; and

Whereas upon their return to civilian life after discharge joined and looked to the Veterans of Foreign Wars (over 3,000 American Japanese members in California) as their veterans organizations that would uphold the civil rights and Constitutional guarantees of all Americans;

Now, therefore, be it resolved that the Veterans of Foreign Wars go on record to continue to protect the civil rights and constitutional guarantees of all Americans; and

Be it further resolved, that it continue to champion the rights of all and that the rights of citizenship will never depend on race or ancestry.●

GREAT LAKES PRESERVATION ACT OF 1985

HON. MARK D. SILJANDER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, today, I introduce the Great Lakes Preservation Act of 1985 in an effort to protect one of our most valuable natural resources, fresh water. The Great Lakes are not only the largest body of fresh water in the United States, but in the world. These lakes make up 95 prcent of U.S. fresh water and 20 percent of that of the world.

The Great Lakes are among the world's major waterways, each year carrying tons of waterborne shipping to and from all parts of the world. The ecosystems of the Great Lakes which provide sustenance and recreation to the people of the United States and Canada have been severely affected, and are continually threatened by the introduction of foreign species into the lakes and by pollution. Diversion of water from the Great Lakes to other areas of the Nation may result in adverse economic and ecological consequences which are not now well understood or predictable.

Careful management of the Great Lakes will permit the rehabilitation and protection of the ecosystems, while continuing and expanding the use of our fresh water resource in industry, food production, transportation, and recreation. At this time, management of the Great Lakes is currently divided among many Federal, State, and international organizations. I believe effective management can be best accomplished through a partnership of the Great Lake States and the Federal Government.

The purposes of this act are: (1) To provide for a rational and effective coordination of the management of the Great Lakes and of the federally supported research aimed at protecting, rehabilitating, and enhancing the environmental quality and natural resources of the Great Lakes; (2) to identify issues of concern which are affecting or will affect the Great Lakes and their environment, and to develop and promote coordinated research, data synthesis, and management plans which address these issues; (3) to provide for the development of the necessary data bases of information to support the rational, efficient, and equitable utilization, development, protection, and rehabilitation of the Great Lakes and their resources; (4) to provide to the Department of State problems and issues to be referred to the International Joint Commission for study and action; (5) to foster public understanding and appreciation, and to assure greater understanding at all levels of Government, of the role of the Great Lakes unique natural resources; and (6) to achieve the goals embodied in the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of 1978 through improved organization and definition of mission on the part of the Federal Government.

I call upon you, my colleagues, to join with me in an effort to protect this important natural resource by offering your support for the Great Lakes Preservation Act of 1985.●

THE NATIONAL INDIVIDUAL TRAINING ACCOUNT ACT

HON. RICHARD J. DURBIN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today with my colleague, SHERWOOD BOEHLERT, to reintroduce the National Individual Training Account Act. The bill will establish joint employer/worker funded accounts that will enable workers to obtain retraining, thereby assisting them in finding new employment.

Our economy is now in the midst of a recovery from the most recent recession, the deepest since the Depression. However, the unemployment legacy of that economic downturn is still being felt. A November Department of Labor Study offers some compelling evidence that the effects of the recession still linger. That study shows that of 5.1 million long-term workers who were displaced from the jobs between 1979 and 1984, 60 percent managed to find new work. However, nearly half of these newly employed earned less in their new jobs than in the one they had lost. Another 25 percent of the 5.1 million dislocated workers are still looking for work. As of yet, they have been unable to make the transition in adjusting their new jobs skill to the changing demands of the job market.

The individual training accounts established in our bill would assist these and other workers in making that transition by allowing them to obtain retraining to acquire new job skills. These new skills in turn will make it easier for them to find employment in the faster growing sectors of the economy.

This legislation offers a flexible approach to the retraining of displaced workers. Its greatest strength is that it is based on a combination of personal initative, limited Government involvement, and the same type of individual choice that is incorporated in the time-tested GI bill approach.

This type of flexible approach is essential in today's rapidly changing economy. The economic recovery we are now experiencing masks a historic shift that is taking place in the structure of the economy. Decline of employment in basic industries such as steel, the rise of new industries, the movement of firms to overseas locations, and the penetration of U.S. markets by foreign companies are only the most visible signs of these changes.

These economic shifts are irreversible. No Government policy can spare American workers and industries from the need to adapt to new realities. However, they can make the adaption less painful that it is now, as witnessed by those underemployed and still unemployed following the most recent recession. Worker displacement is high in many regions of the country, making some kind of adjustment assistance a necessity.

We believe that the establishment of individual training accounts will contribute substantially easing displaced workers' transition to new employment.

We were pleased with the success of our bill in the 98th Congress as it attracted 77 cosponsors. We are confident that it will meet with much success in the 99th Congress, and we look forward to working on it.●

RETAIN 16-CENT EXCISE TAX ON CIGARETTES AND EARMARK PART FOR MEDICARE TO PAY FOR TREATING SMOKING-RELATED DISEASES

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, in the name of good health, both fiscally for Medicare and physically for Americans, I am introducing legislation to continue the 16-cent excise tax on cigarettes with a cost-of-living adjustment factor and earmark 8 cents of the tax for the Medicare trust fund.

This bill has the potential of saving thousands of lives and raising billions of dollars. It also would require those who smoke to pay for their smoking-related diseases.

Although the hazards of smoking are generally known, the actual statistics demonstrate dramatically the importance of this legislation. The Surgeon General has estimated that 350,000 people now die of smoking-related diseases annually. In fact, smoking has killed more people in this country than all the Americans killed in major wars and traffic accidents. Equally tragic is the fact that, annually 10 million people will suffer from smoking-related disabilities.

As a result, the costs to society of smoking-related illnesses, are also dramatic and staggering. The American Cancer Society estimates that cigarette smoking is now costing $27 billion in medical care costs annually. This is over 10 percent of all health care costs in the United States. In addition, there is a total annual loss of productivity of $34 billion due to excess morbidity and disability and to premature death. There are nearly 80 million lost working days, about 20 percent of which can be attributed to the effects of cigarette smoking. According to a recent study by Policy Analysis, Inc., medical expenses and lost wages for a man aged 35 to 44 who smokes more than two packs of cigarettes a day would average $58,987 over his lifetime; for a woman in the same category, the cost would be $20,152—reflecting women's lower earning potential.

Perhaps most tragic of all is that this loss of life and cost to our society is totally preventable. Smoking is the major preventable cause of illness and death in this country.

Mr. Speaker, although my bill will not eliminate cigarette smoking, it at least will shift part of this enormous public financial burden from nonsmokers to the smokers who cause these costs. The concept is a simple one. Because cigarette smokers clearly incur a higher percentage of health costs, they should pay a greater percentage of those costs that smoking generates. In short, this tax is a user fee to repay the public for some of the costs of smoking cigarettes.

By earmarking half of the cigarette excise tax revenue and transferring it to the Medicare trust fund, the money would be directly available to cover a portion of these health costs. Medicare and Medicaid spend nearly $4 billion annually for the treatment of smoking-related diseases. Maintaining the 16-cent excise tax on a pack of cigarettes will generate revenues of $5.175 billion in fiscal year 1985. In other words, with half of this amount going to Medicare, the user fee would cover the lion's share of smoking-related Medicare Program costs.

This legislation would also be one of many necessary steps to aid the ailing Medicare Program. Studies presented to a special advisory council set up by the Department of Health and Human Services have found that earmarking excise tax revenue for the Medicare trust fund is one way to meet the financial crisis Medicare is facing. According to experts, the total cost of Medicare may run as much as $400 billion ahead of its revenue between now and 1995. At that rate, the Medicare hospital fund will be depleted around 1991-92. My bill is a step in the direction of reducing this huge deficit and would raise for Medicare roughly $2.5 billion in fiscal year 1985 and even more in the outyears.

The Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 raised the Federal tax on cigarettes for the first time since 1951 from 8 cents to 16 cents per pack. Unforturnately, the legislation provided for termination of the increase in 1985. My bill would make the increase permanent and would provide yearly cost-of-living adjustments on the tax. The revenues from cigarette taxes in real amounts have actually dropped since 1951, even considering the increase in 1982. Had the tax been adjusted for increases in the Consumer Price Index the tax in 1983 would have been 30 cents per package. During the 1970's, cigarette excise tax collections fell from 1 percent of all Federal budget receipts to only 0.5 percent in 1980. Despite this lost ground, this legislation only calls for making permanent the 16 cent tax and then adjusting by the CPI, or 1 cent per pack, whichever is less.

Not only is this legislation cost effective, it is supported by the majority of the American public. Seventy-seven percent answered affirmatively when asked if they favored an increase in the cigarette excise tax; this was part of a national poll taken last January by Yankelovich, Skelly & White to determine the public's views on alternate ways to reduce the Federal deficit. Even more importantly, the Yankelovich survey demonstrates that smokers as well as nonsmokers are not opposed to this measure.

Mr. Speaker, since smokers are aware of the health risks of smoking and can actually prevent them, it makes sense that they begin to pay a greater share of their extra health costs. I hope my colleagues will seriously consider this long overdue effort to increase the cigarette excise tax and earmark for the Medicare trust fund. In so doing, we will be attacking America's No. 1 preventable cause of death and helping to keep Medicare sound and solvent for us all.●

GABRIEL LOZANO, SR.

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to express my sorrow at the recent death of former Corpus Christi mayor, Gabriel Lozano, Sr. I was saddened by Mr. Lozano's death, but proud of his many fine accomplishments and his dedication to public service. I know the people of Corpus Christi join me in extending my deepest sympathies to his wife, children, and grandchildren.

I had the great pleasure and honor of working with Mr. Lozano during his many years of service to the people of Corpus Christi. Mr. Lozano was first elected to the city council in 1959, when he served a 2-year term, and was reelected in 1967. He served 14 years on the council, which represented more consecutive terms than any other member to date. Mr. Lozano went on to serve as the city's mayor pro tem and later mayor.

Mr. Lozano distinguished himself in many ways during these terms, but perhaps most importantly by serving as a role model to other Hispanics. He demonstrated with persistence, tact, and congeniality that he could work with other politicians holding different views. He possessed a special talent for reaching out to people and finding common ground. Mr. Lozano repeatedly demonstrated that he had the dedication, intelligence, and ability to serve all of the people of Corpus Christi, regardless of their race or socioeconomic class. Mr. Lozano was a fine example to many other Hispanics who have gone on to serve in all levels of government.

Mr. Lozano was a calming influence in times of political trouble and unrest in Corpus Christi. He used his powers of persuasion and his friendliness to work with people to reach compromise and solutions to problems. In the words of one of Mr. Lozano's colleagues: "He was a stabilizing factor when the city was going through tough problems. He was a solid member of the council and always available to work." Another likened his outgoing nature and calm reason to pouring oil on troubled waters. Mr. Lozano had that keen ability to work with people that is essential to any civic leader.

It was not easy in the 1950's and 1960's for a Mexican American to serve in public office. But Mr. Lozano had a way of reaching out to people that helped him transcend the traditional barriers to Mexican Americans holding office. He broke new ground when he was first elected to office and helped raise expectations for Hispanic businessmen and civic leaders. He showed us, too, anything was possible, given enough commitment and perserverance. Mr. Lozano's influence will be sorely missed in our community.

I am pleased to have called Mr. Lozano a friend and colleague. He served as an important model to me when I first became a member of the Nueces County Commission. I learned a great deal by observing his way of working with people of different political persuasions. He has enriched the city of Corpus Christi by his many accomplishments and his unwaivering commitment to the public good.

Mr. Lozano was instrumental in developing the economy of Corpus Christi. He helped build the Convention Center which he realized would create new jobs and bring money into the local economy. He was committed to improving the quality of life for all the people of Corpus Christi. Mr. Lozano saw projects such as the Convention Center as a means for creating long-term economic growth.

In addition to his commitment to prosperity for city residents, Mr. Lozano was also dedicated to improving the rights and status of Mexican Americans. He was a charter member of the League of United Latin American Citizens and had served as president of the Corpus Christi branch of LULAC. Despite his hectic official schedule, Mr. Lozano also found time to work for the community through the chamber of commerce and the Red Cross. Mr. Lozano helped form the Nueces National Bank and was a member of the board of directors. Throughout his life, he blended public service, community activism, and voluntarism in a way that will ensure his memory lives on in the hearts of the people of Corpus Christi.

I want to extend my deepest sympathies to his wife, Juanita, and to his children, Gabe, Jr., David, Robert, Peter, and Imelda. He is also survived by 3 sisters, a brother, 16 grandchildren, and 6 great-grandchildren.

I know Mr. Lozano's family is proud of him and his lifetime commitment to the public good. I hope they will cherish the many fine memories of him and will be strengthened by the knowledge that many of us share in their grief. We will remember them all in our thoughts and prayers.●

NATIONAL DIVIDEND ACT

HON. BILL ALEXANDER

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, as Congress reconvenes, the problem of the Federal deficit looms larger than ever.

I am today introducing the National Dividend Act, which incorporates principles of both supply side and demand side economics in an effort to give citizens a more direct stake in the economy and reduce the deficit in the process.

I believe the proposals embodied in the National Dividend Act are unique, and elements thereof are worthy of serious consideration as a part of the impending debate on how to resolve the deficit dilemma. I urge my colleagues to give this concept their close attention.●

HAMADY BROS. FOOD MARKETS FEEDS THE NEEDY WITH "OPERATION CHRISTMAS" IN FLINT, MI

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I bring to the attention of the Congress the tremendous effort to feed the needy over the recent holidays in Michigan's Seventh Congressional District by a civic-minded businessman there, Mr. Alex Dandy.

Through the "Operation Christmas 1984 Project," Mr. Dandy and his supermarkets, the Hamady Bros. Food Markets, fed more than 15,000 needy families in the Flint area over the holidays. It was a project coordinated by Mr. Dandy which involved hundreds of supporting workers and agencies and merited the attention of the national news media and a letter of support from President Reagan.

Mr. Dandy and the Hamady Bros. Food Markets have supported such a project for 4 years now, but the 1984 project was by far the most ambitious undertaking. In 1981, Mr. Dandy conceived the project and fed 558 needy families. In 1982, he fed 1,226 families and in 1983 he fed 5,450 families. He decided to greatly increase the size of the project in 1984, and settled upon an original goal of raising enough money to feed 7,000 families. By the end of November, however, he already had raised enough money from generous supporters to feed more than his original goal, so he increased the goal to 10,000 families. Later, he increased the goal again to reach all of the approximately 15,000 families on public assistance in the area.

Mr. Dandy mailed a food certificate to each family, entitling them to redeem it at any of the 28 Hamady Bros. outlets in the Seventh District for two bags of groceries. Each certificate was valid for enough food to feed a family a holiday dinner. Each family received a 6-pound roaster chicken, a box of stuffing mix, 3 pounds of Michigan apples, a dozen serving rolls, a loaf of white bread, a pumpkin pie, a large bottle of soft drink, 9 ounces of potato chips, 5 pounds of Michigan white potatoes, a half gallon of milk, a can of cranberry sauce, and two cans of green beans. In all, more than 187 tons of food were distributed.

More than $10,000 was raised from the general public for the project through donation cannisters placed throughout the area in Hamady Bros. stores, factories and other business locations. In addition, $25,000 was donated by the General Motors/United Auto Workers Care and Share Program, and $125,000 was contributed by food vendors and suppliers. Mr. Dandy donated $50,000 personally. Hamady Bros. absorbed administrative, handling, and other costs which is estimated at more than $200,000 additionally.

In addition, United Way provided the postal permit and postage and donated space for the mailing preparation; U.S. Postal Service employees expedited the mail so that certificates would reach people in time for the holidays; more than 200 human service agencies coordinated their holiday activities to eliminate duplication and to ensure that everyone was reached; hundreds of community volunteers pitched in to help with answering telephones, processing applications, rechecking addresses, and a myriad of other tasks to make the project successful.

The "Operation Christmas 1984 Project" was a tremendous success because of the hard work and dedication of Mr. Dandy, the employees of Hamady Bros., and the businesses, churches, and community volunteers who donated time, money, and other items.

It was a community-wide effort under Mr. Dandy's leadership and inspired by his own personal example. It was one of the finest examples in the Nation of people helping others less fortunate than they so that together all could enjoy a full meal for the holidays.

Mr. Dandy is deserving of this special recognition by the Congress for his outstanding commitment to his community. His accomplishment merits the highest commendation.●

IRA AND RETIREMENT PLANS ABILITY TO INVEST IN TANGIBLE ASSETS

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to reinstate the ability of an Individual Retirement Account [IRA] and certain other individually directed retirement plans to invest in tangible assets—which some call collectibles. It became clear that certain abuses had taken place prior to the 1981 ban on these investments. Congress overreacted in 1981 by passing a total ban on such transactions. My proposal removes this total ban by specifically addressing these problems and setting up practical procedures which can easily be checked for compliance by the IRS which will prevent these types of abuses.

An additional reason for the ban in 1981 was a general feeling that the banks and savings and loans were encountering significant problems because of disintermediation and other reasons. That problem has clearly been eliminated in the last few years. In fact, a large number of financial institutions are now offering precious metals and numismatic programs, for instance, sales or loans to the public.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that Americans should have the freedom to choose between different types of investment options. We, in Congress, should not try to force this choice upon them. My proposal returns this basic financial freedom to Americans. Thus, if coins will provide a better return than stock, their IRA can invest in coins. And when stock provides the better investment their IRA can switch to stock. The present ban has the unfortunate result of reducing the earning potential of IRA's by not allowing a choice between all types of investments, thus reducing the retirement funds of the elderly. Mr. Speaker, I do not think this should be done if we can address the problems in a reasonable manner. My proposal does this.

I would hope that the Committee on Ways and Means will quickly approve my proposal to allow IRA's and other individually directed retirement plans to acquire tangible investment assets.

The specifics of my proposal follow:

PROPOSAL

The uncomplicated proposal is to substitute for the total ban of present section 408(m) of the tax law, the following set of rules:

The acquisition (whether by contribution or otherwise) of a tangible investment asset by an IRA or other covered account from the individual (or his beneficiaries) for whose benefit the account has been created is barred.

The transfer (whether by distribution, loan, use, or otherwise) of a tangible investment asset by an IRA or other covered account to the individual (or his beneficiaries) for whose benefit the account has been created is barred.

Under the proposal an IRA may invest in tangible investment assets by purchasing at arm's length in the market place, hold for appreciation, and sell in the market place at arm's length.

ACCOMMODATION TO TAX LAW CONCERNS

The supporters of the total ban imposed by section 408(m) were reacting to the following potentials for abuse. Each is eliminated under the proposal.

1. Acquisition Value.—A potential for abuse might have arisen where the taxpayer contributes from his own collection to his IRA a stamp, rare coin, antique, work of art, or other tangible investment asset and the contributed property is aggressively valued. The available audit resources of the Internal Revenue Service do not permit adequate policing.

The proposal avoids the potential abuse as effectively as does present section 408(m). Under both regimes the taxpayer cannot transfer a tangible investment asset to the IRA. There is of course no valuation issue in a purchase by the IRA on the market.

2. Distribution Value.—Another potential abuse might have arisen where the IRA distributes a tangible investment asset to the taxpayer or his beneficiary if, at the time of distribution, the property is conservatively valued and, more than a year later the recipient sells the tangible investment asset at a high price. The available audit resources of the Internal Revenue Service do not permit adequate policing.

Again, the proposal avoids the potential abuse as effectively as does present section 408(m). Under both regimes the IRA cannot transfer a tangible investment asset to the taxpayer or his beneficiary. There is no valuation issue in a sale by the IRA on the market.

3. Consumption Value.—Another potential abuse might have arisen where there is a purported transfer out of his personal collection and into an IRA of a work of art, rug, antique, or other tangible investment asset that carries a consumption value, but the taxpayer in fact continues to enjoy that benefit through retained possession or use. Once again, the available audit resources of the Internal Revenue Service do not permit adequate policing.

The proposal avoids the potential abuse as effectively as does present section 408(m). The IRA custodian can only acquire a tangible investment asset directly from a seller on the market and can only dispose of a collectible to a buyer on the market. It can never be loaned to him. He can never use it. It is never in his hands or on his wall or floor. The asset's consumption value is not retained or enjoyed by the taxpayer. Thus, without increasing the audit burden the proposal effectuates the prohibition in ERISA against the taxpayer's use of IRA assets before the taxpayer retires. ●

GILMAN SEEKS RELIEF IN BRINKS TRIAL COSTS

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, once again I bring before my colleagues the plight of my constituents in Rockland, Orange and Westchester Counties. For several years now, owing to the Brink's robbery trial conducted by members of the Weather Underground, these fine constituents of our 22d Congressional District have been suffering the immense costs associated with a trial of such national proportions. Due to the terrorist nature of the defendants, part of a nationwide network of revolutionary groups and subgroups, intense and high-level security precautions had to be undertaken in order to protect local citizens from possible retaliation. Arrested in Rockland County, the defendants were first prosecuted in Orange County following an order for a change of venue. Subsequently, the trial was moved again to neighboring Westchester County. Because in each instance, new security precautions had to be undertaken, the cost of the trial escalated. Concluded this past summer, a close estimate of the final costs hovers around $5 million. Indeed, Time magazine has described the Brinks trial as the most expensive in history.

The crux of this problem lies with a provision of New York State law, which proscribes that all costs associated with a criminal prosecution must be borne by the county in which the crime was committed. This means that Rockland County must reimburse both Orange and Westchester counties for their share of the costs of the trial. The extreme burden that rests with Rockland County escalated to the point where they have become appropriate candidates for disaster assistance.

Last September, the Subcommittee on Administrative Law of the Judiciary Committee held a hearing on H.R. 5763, the same measure I am reintroducing today. That hearing focused on the substantial financial burden being shouldered by Rockland County, as well as the clear Federal interest in seeing this case prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. Therefore, because State penalties were more severe than the Federal penalties, it was incumbent upon the State, as well as the Federal Government, to see the defendants prosecuted.

The entire Westchester delegation joins with me introducing this measure. Messrs. FISH, BIAGGI and DIOGUARDI recognize that the Federal Government has a responsibility to all three counties in seeing to it that Rockland County is reimbursed. Otherwise, payment to the county governments or Orange and Westchester dims.

Mr. Speaker, we were all encouraged by the consideration given to Rockland County by the chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Law, Mr. HALL, and the other subcommittee members. I am hopeful that this Congress we can see further favorable action on this legislation. I ask that the full text of the bill be inserted at this point in the RECORD, and urge my colleagues to support us in this endeavor.

A bill to authorize Federal financial assistance to the government of Rockland County, New York, for all reasonable expenses incurred in connection with the Brinks robbery trial

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Attorney General of the United States (hereinafter referred to as the "Attorney General") shall reimburse the government of Rockland County, New York, for all reasonable expenses incurred in connection with the transfer and trial of the criminal actions entitled "People of the State of New York v. Katherine Boudin, David Gilbert, Judith Clark, Samuel Brown, and Donald Weems" (Rockland County indictments numbered 81-285; 82-6; transferred to Orange County) and "People of the State of New York v. Katherine Boudin and Samuel Brown" (Rockland County indictments numbered 81-285; 82-6; transferred to Westchester County). Reimbursement under this Act shall be made to Rockland County for all reasonable expenses directly incurred as a result of these criminal actions, as well as for those reasonable expenses indirectly incurred as a result of the change of venue in these actions to other locations within New York State. Reimbursable items include, but are not limited to—

(1) the cost of prosecuting the defendants;

(2) the cost of providing and maintaining courtroom security in these criminal actions; and

(3) the cost of ensuring and maintaining the safety and security of the defendants and the residents of the State of New York in connection with these criminal actions.

SEC. 2. The government of Rockland County shall keep accurate and detailed records pertaining to all reasonable expenses incurred in connection with these trials. Such records shall remain subject to audit and examination by the Attorney General and Comptroller General of the United States for three years after the date of enactment of this Act. Following the completion of each criminal action described in section 1, the government of Rockland County shall submit to the Attorney General a final and detailed report disclosing all reasonable expenses incurred in connection with these criminal actions. The Attorney General shall examine each report and determine the amount of reimbursement for which Rockland County is eligible under this Act.

SEC. 3. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for any fiscal year beginning on or after October 1, 1985, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.●

THE MICHIGAN BASKETBALL ADVISORY COUNCIL

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues in the Congress the work of the Michigan Basketball Advisory Council, which is headquartered in Kalamazoo, MI. The council was conceived in 1980 as a body of private citizens dedicated to enhancing the opportunity for Michigan youth to participate in athletics in general and basketball in particular. The Council is equally dedicated to protecting the integrity of athletics as a foundation for the building of those qualities of character—self discipline, teamwork, and competitiveness—which are the cornerstone of our American way of life.

The response to these ideas has been tremendous. In 4 years the council has grown to include more than 100 members from across Michigan. The efforts of these members have been, in the true American tradition, on an entirely volunteer and cooperative basis.

In this short time span the council has made possible contributions of more than $4,000 in cash and athletic equipment to Michigan schools, universities, communities, athletic clubs, and other sports-minded organizations.

The council has contributed significantly to the public awareness of Michigan's many outstanding basketball programs and deserves recongnition for the work and commitment of its members.●

THREE WAYS TO ACHIEVE FISCAL RESPONSIBILITY

HON. ANDY IRELAND

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, as the 99th Congress convenes we are again faced with the formidable task of balancing the Federal budget. It should be clear to all of us that rhetoric—the same words we have heard year after year—will not accomplish the goal. We must add the requirement for a balanced budget to the basic document of our Government—the Constitution.

The economic indicators are definitely pointing to an economy which is good for all Americans, particularly with an inflation rate of 4 to 5 percent. Such an optimistic outlook gives one pause to wonder why all the ruckus about balancing the Federal budget. It is obvious to me, as it is to many of our colleagues, that if the Government continues its excessive demand for money, there will not be enough to finance investments needed to continue on our current path of economic growth. Unless we change course, interest rates will rise driving many prospective buyers out of the money markets.

While there can be more than one reason for rising interest rates, the Federal deficit is certainly the most obvious culprit.

For these reasons, I have, along with many Members of Congress, sponsored House Joint Resolution 27, providing a constitutional amendment to balance the Federal budget. I would urge my colleagues, who have not done so, to cosponsor this critical legislation.

I also believe that if we are truly serious about bringing the Federal budget under control, we need to consider ways to restrain spending. A constitutional amendment to give the President of the United States line-item veto authority, a tool used in 43 States with proven success, is one of the best means we can offer to cut Federal spending.

A line-item veto would give the President the chance to pare back spending in specific areas without rejecting whole pieces of legislation containing worthwhile and necessary programs. Most State governments find the line-item veto approach useful in restraining the natural impulse of legislatures to include items which may not stand up to the test of individual votes. Those same legislatures manage to keep spending and taxation in balance.

I believe we can benefit from the example given us by the States. I, again, urge my colleagues to sponsor, as I have done, legislation providing a constitutional amendment to give the President line item veto authority.

Third, I am introducing legislation today to express the sense of the Congress that once a balanced budget is achieved, any surplus be applied to the reduction of the national debt.

Mr. Speaker, with the achievement of a balanced budget we cannot allow ourselves to slip back to the irresponsible spending practices of the past. We must use that achievement as the foundation for a solid commitment to fiscal responsibility for the future.

Once again, I ask my colleagues in the House to review these three legislative initiatives with an eye toward ensuring the fiscal integrity of our Nation, and add their names as supporters of these measures critical to our Nation's future.●

THE NATURAL GAS POLICY ACT OF 1978

HON. RICHARD J. DURBIN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, there are many indications that natural gas price increases will be far more moderate this winter than they have been in the recent past. This is most welcome news to beleaguered natural gas consumers, who have been forced to bear the brunt of skyrocketing gas prices over the past several years.

Despite these optimistic predictions, I believe that we must maintain our vigilance to ensure that gas consumers receive the price relief they well deserve. For that reason, I am reintroducing a bill I sponsored in the 98th Congress which is intended to ease the burden of natural gas prices on consumers, as well as to increase information available to the public involving the ratemaking process.

The bill has two sections. The first requires the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to submit semiannual reports to the Energy Committees of the House and Senate. These reports are to compile and organize information filed by pipeline companies at FERC to make data on pipeline activities more readily available to Congress and the public. With enhanced accessibility to this information, Congress and the public will be able to exercise much greater scrutiny over pipeline activities.

In these semiannual reports, FERC will specifically required to submit:

A list of all purchase gas adjustments from all pipeline companies during the past 6 months;

A list of all rate changes, including the percent change;

The status before FERC of each rate filing and of those filings still pending from the preceding periods;

A description of any action taken by FERC, or change in FERC policy, that has a positive or negative effect on consumer prices, along with an analysis of that effect.

The second section of the bill modifies FERC's current policy of granting interim rate hikes to pipeline companies subject to refund. The bill specifies that consumers will not be called on to pay the higher prices unless and until FERC has ruled on the lawfulness of that rate hike. Under the present system, there is very little incentive for FERC and pipelines to resolve the question of a rate hike quickly because the interim rate hike allows pipelines to collect the higher rates indefinitely. My bill will not allow that interim hike to go into effect until FERC has made a decision, except in the case of severe financial hardship on the part of the pipeline.

I believe that this bill requiring pipelines to prove that these increased costs are justified before they can begin to collect from consumers and increasing congressional and public access to FERC's information will guarantee that lower gas costs are passed along directly to consumers. I welcome my colleagues' support for this legislation.●

LEGISLATION NEEDED TO ALLOW CONTINUED ACCESS TO HEALTH INSURANCE FOR WOMEN AND THEIR CHILDREN

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, millions of women and their children are without health insurance in an era when the lack of such insurance can mean having no medical care at all. In response to this growing problem Representative CLAY and I are today introducing legislation requiring group health insurance plans to allow continued access to the plan for women and their dependent children who have been previously covered but, due to a change in family status suddenly find themselves uninsured.

Among nearly 100 million full-time and part-time civilian workers nationwide, 59 million were covered by their employers' health plans. Yet anywhere from 49.1 million to 76.7 million Americans under 65 either lack full-year insurance or have inadequate policies, according to a study by the Department of Health and Human Services. Lacking health insurance, last year alone, 200,000 Americans were denied emergency hospital care and 800,000 were denied routine hospital care.

Divorced and widowed women and their children are particularly vulnerable. Once there has been a change in their marital status, under the terms of most group health policies they are not continued in the group and must obtain their own health insurance. Even though the plans frequently allow for the conversion to an individual policy, it is far more expensive compared to the group policy, usually offers less coverage, and often does not pay for preexisting conditions. The consequence is that the divorced or widowed nonworking spouse is put into a position of paying much more for must less health insurance or going without coverage altogether. All too frequently she and her children go without coverage. In fact, in a study conducted by the National Medical Care Expenditure Survey, divorced women were found twice as likely to be uninsured as married women. Using the Current Population Survey, the Urban Institute determined that 16.6 percent of divorced/separated women and 7 percent of widowed women aged 19 to 64 were without health coverage. In California alone this means approximately one-half million women are without health coverage.

Spouses of employed workers who become medicare eligible constitute another group who too frequently lose group health insurance. Under the terms of many health policies, when the employed spouse becomes medicare eligible he or she and the unemployed spouse loses group coverage. All to often these people become insurance poor as they scramble to pay medicare part B premiums, find supplemental medicare policies and seek individual coverage for the ineligible spouse.

INDIVIDUALS COVERED

To help these various groups obtain health insurance, this legislation denies the business tax deduction for group health insurance to all employers who fail to provide 5 years of continuation coverage to the above individuals. The corresponding ERISA provisions are also amended to allow individuals the right to sue employers who fail to provide for the continuation option. After the 5 years a conversion option must also be available. Specifically the continuation option will be extended to: (1) widows and widowers and dependent children of employed spouses who have been covered under the group plan for at least the preceding month prior to the death of the employed spouse, (2) divorced and separated individuals and dependent children of employed spouses who have been covered under the plan for at least the preceding month prior to the separation or divorce, and (3) spouses under 65 of covered employees who become Medicare eligible.

NOTIFICATION OF CONTINUATION OPTION

In order to make policy holders aware of the continuation option, every insurer will be required to notify all group members and their dependents of the continuation option at the time of the issuance of the policy. Both spouses will have to sign and return a form to the insurer stating they have read and understand the terms of the continuation option. Upon a change in marital status of an employed spouse or upon Medicare eligibility, the employed spouse must notify the insurer of such a change. In the case of the death of an employed spouse, the employer will be required by the terms of the policy to notify the insurer of the change. Within 14 days of notification by the employer or employee of a status change, the group health plan is to notify the affected dependents of the continuation option by first class mail to the last known address. The affected spouse and dependent children will have 90 days after being notified by the group plan to apply for the continuation coverage. They may not be dropped from coverage during this 90-day period.

TERMS OF THE POLICY

To insure affordable coverage the continuation option will not be conditional upon any physical examination. It will entitle the individual to the same scope of coverage as similarly situated individuals provided under the group plan at the time of continuation.

LENGTH OF CONTINUATION POLICY

The continuation privilege is to continue for 5 years above and beyond the 90-day initial period. At the end of the 5-year continuation period the spouse and dependents are to be offered the right to a conversion policy. Spouses and eligible dependents may not be terminated during the continuation period unless one of the following conditions occur: (1) the employer no longer offers any group health plan, (2) the insured spouse fails to make timely payments of the premiums, (3) the insured spouse becomes eligible for equivalent coverage under another group policy or becomes eligible for Medicare, or (4) the insured spouse remarries, but the marriage of a dependent child will not invalidate the continuation provisions for other members of the family.

PAYMENT OF PREMIUM

Both the employer and employee share of the premium is to be paid by the insured spouse directly to the insurer, or to the employer if the insurer and employer agree to such an arrangement. This does not preclude the employer from continuing to pay the premium for the spouse and dependent children if he/she so chooses. The policy will provide that the continuing individual will have the option of paying the premium in monthly installments. Most importantly, premiums may not exceed the combined employer/employee premiums assessed for each similarly situated group member under the group insurance policy. In order to minimize the cost of this legislation to the insurer, premiums may be based upon the community costs of the pool of members of the group insurance policy, family members and dependents covered under the group, and continued policy holders.

EFFECTIVE DATE

On or after January 1, 1986, every group contract subject to the provisions of this bill will provide for a 5-year continuation option within the plan for the above groups, with the right to convert after the 5 years to a conversion policy.

Mr. Speaker, the beauty of this legislation is that we can provide millions of women and their children with access to affordable group health insurance without costing the Federal Government a dime and with nominal or no cost to the health insurance industry. Knowing that the lack of health insurance too often means going without health care, Mr. CLAY and I hope our colleagues will see the merit of this bill and join us in seeking speedy passage.●

REDRESS FOR JAPANESE AMERICANS

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I join our esteemed majority leader, JIM WRIGHT and a number of our distinguished colleagues in introducing the Civil Liberties Act of 1985. This legislation addresses an issue of fundamental importance to our system of constitutional liberty.

During the 98th Congress, we introduced this legislation as H.R. 4110. The bill was designed to specifically implement the findings and recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians. Our new bill, H.R. 442, is identical in substance to the bill introduced in the 98th Congress.

I am particularly pleased by the number that has been chosen for the bill, H.R. 442. This number honors the famous 442d Regimental Combat Team of World War II. This unit was composed entirely of Americans of Japanese ancestry, many of whom had volunteered from this Nation's detention camps. Forced to leave their homes on the west coast with their families, these dedicated Americans volunteered for combat duty to protect and serve the United States. While they shed their blood in the service of this Nation, their families—parents, brothers, sisters, wives, and children—remained behind barbed wire and under armed military guard as prisoners of the country for which these men were willing to give their lives in combat.

The 442d fought in some of the fiercest and bloodiest campaigns of the European theater. It was the most highly decorated unit of its size in the military history of the United States. During five major campaigns, this unit earned over 18,000 decorations and had over 9,000 Purple Hearts. It is fitting that this historic legislation should be designated in honor of these fine men.

The civil rights abridgement which this legislation addresses began for Americans of Japanese ancestry on February 19, 1942, when President Franklin Roosevelt signed the infamous Executive Order 9066. This order authorized military commanders to exclude citizens and aliens from certain areas, supposedly to protect against acts of sabotage and espionage. The order was promulgated regardless of the fact that no documented cases of disloyalty by Japanese Americans existed and none has subsequently arisen.

Executive Order 9066 was the first step in an odyssey of deprivation, detention, and denial of civil rights. Soon after the order, all American citizens of Japanese ancestry and resident aliens were prohibited from living, working, or traveling on the west coast. Japanese Americans living in the area were removed to temporary assembly centers and then on to relocation camps where conditions ranged from passable to deplorable. The concept of habeas corpus was simply forgotten.

What was the experience of those camps? For my parents there was the discouraging loss of business, home, and other possessions. There are visions of barbed wire fences and sentry dogs, of loss of privacy and lack of adequate sanitation; and memories of the heart-wrenching divisions that occurred as families were separated by physical distance and the emotional distress of the camps. And there was the stigma of implied guilt as this Nation determined that we were a threat to national security, that because of our race, no matter how many generations passed, Americans of Japanese ancestry could never really be trustworthy Americans.

But what is most striking about all of these internment camp stories is the faith and hope that remained. Faith in the law of the land; pride in this country; and most of all, a sincere desire to prove loyalty to this great Nation and be allowed to serve its ideals and principles. All this, despite the fact that basic constitutional and civil rights were being denied.

It is the spirit of this faith that brings me before you today. For I firmly believe that our actions here are essential for giving credibility to our constitutional system and reinforcing our tradition of justice. More than half of the original internees have already died, but it is not too late to return the rightful honor to those who remain among us. It is certainly not too late to provide compensation for these living individuals. And it is never too late to send a message to future generations that such a tragic denial of constitutional rights cannot and will not be tolerated.

SUMMARY OF H.R. 442

Congress acknowledges the fundamental injustice of the internment, apologizes for it, and seeks to prevent the recurrence of any similar event.

AS REGARDS AMERICANS OF JAPANESE ANCESTRY

On behalf of the Nation, the Congress apologizes to those Americans of Japanese ancestry who were interned.

The President is requested to offer pardons to those convicted of violating laws during the internment period, whose violation was based on a refusal to accept racially discriminatory treatment.

When reviewing requests for review of administrative rulings relating to the internment, executive agencies are asked to review such cases with liberality, giving full consideration to the findings of the Commission and Congress.

A trust fund of $1.5 billion is authorized for educational and humanitarian purposes, and a board of directors is created to manage the fund. Out of the trust fund, the Attorney General shall pay $20,000 in compensation to each surviving internee.

AS REGARDS AMERICANS OF ALEUT ANCESTRY

A trust fund of $5 million is authorized for community, educational, and cultural programs benefiting the Aleuts, and a board of directors is created to manage the fund.

Each of the survivors of the Aleut internment shall receive $12,000 in compensation.

Churches and community centers destroyed in World War II shall be rebuilt.

Hazardous debris remaining from World War II shall be cleared away from the Aleutian Islands.

The Island of Atty shall be returned to the native corporation, provided that the Coast Guard will be able to continue its use of the island.●

YEAR OF SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I proudly rise this morning in support of House Joint Resolution 1 which designates 1985 as the "Year of Social Security."

This year marks the 50th anniversary of our Nation's major social insurance program. Today this program covers and protects an overwhelming majority of Americans against the potential loss of income due to old age, disability or death. Furthermore, it assists in meeting the potentially devastating medical expenses of the elderly and the disabled. As a result millions of Americans from every region of our Nation, and from every walk of life can look forward to a retirement based on a secure economic foundation.

All Americans should be proud of the record of success that our Social Security Program has earned since it's beginning in 1935. Even more importantly all Americans should be reassured that the program will continue to meet the challenge of providing Social Security. Today this future promise is secured not only by the orginal vision and genius of our forefathers, but by 50 years of demonstrated success, and by the program's continued evolution and adaptation in response to the demands of our ever changing society.

Because Social Security is a program of importance for all Americans I urge each of my colleagues to join in support of this resolution. Let us all join together in declaring 1985 the "Year of Social Security" to honor this most important and successful social program.●

CITRUS CANKER

HON. ANDY IRELAND

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, today Congressman TOM LEWIS and I are introducing legislation to provide direct Federal loans and federally guaranteed loans to members of the Florida citrus industry who have been seriously impacted by the recent discovery of citrus canker in Florida and the measures taken to control the spread of the disease.

Citrus canker is the second devastating occurrence to hit the industry in recent months. 1984 began with a freeze that resulted in lost acreage and lost fruit totaling $1.5 billion. That figure does not include the value of the fruit that will be lost in future years as a result of tree loss. The value of packing and processing revenues foregone is estimated at over $300 million.

Then, in early September of last year, citrus canker, the dreaded disease for which there is no cure, was found in a Florida nursery. Canker is contagious and can be spread easily by infected nursery stock and budwood, by windy rainstorms, and by contact with insects, animals, people, and equipment. It is persistent and difficult to control and eradicate. Canker can attack leaves, twigs, and fruit of most Florida citrus, causing defoliation, fruit drop, and general decline of both nursery stock and mature producing trees. To date, it has been found in a total of nine nurseries.

Immediately upon confirmation of the disease USDA embargoed the shipment of all Florida citrus—both within and outside the State. Federal Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service [APHIS] with the cooperation of the State of Florida instituted the citrus canker "Action Plan." It called for the destruction of all nurseries in which canker was discovered. It ordered the destruction of all resets in groves which had been purchased from infected nurseries whether or not canker was found. In addition, if canker is identified, an area 125 feet around the resets is to be destroyed.

Further stringent actions have been taken to prevent the spread of the disease within the State and to other citrus producing regions of the country. All interstate shipments must be from areas certified as canker free and fruit from these areas must be dipped in a chlorine solution. Not until November did the State, with additional regulation, again allow retail sales of Florida citrus within the State. Many small roadside sellers, who depend on tourist traffic and Christmas sales, are on the verge of bankruptcy because they cannot comply with the regulation for dipping and labeling.

The legislation we are proposing is designed to help small growers, nurserymen, packers, and sellers who have been adversely impacted by the Government's action to control citrus canker—nurserymen and growers whose property has been destroyed and packers and sellers who were unable to market their products because of the restrictions. Our proposal is similar to that developed in response to economic injury resulting from other Government programs such as PIK.

It amends the Small Business Act to establish an entirely new program, separate and distinct from other disaster and economic injury loan programs which the act currently authorizes. It allows the Small Business Administration to make either direct loans or to guarantee loans to citrus related small businesses affected by citrus canker.

These loans are not contingent upon a borrower's ability to obtain commercial credit, but do require that the ability of the borrower to repay his/her debt be established as part of the loan review process.

The maximum term of the loan is set at 7 years. Newly planted citrus trees often do not bear fruit for 5 or more years. In addition, those whose nurseries or groves have been infected by canker cannot replant for 2 years, and in some instances, a longer time period is required. Seven years is, I believe, a fair term given the production schedule unique to citrus.

The maximum size of the loan is limited to $750,000. Again, due to the long term nature of the investment and the recovery period, I believe this to be an equitable limit.

Mr. Speaker, we have reviewed existing sources of assistance such as the Farmers' Home Administration and SBA disaster loan programs and found they are inadequate to meet the needs now experienced by this vital industry. Every indication we have is that many Florida citrus and nurserymen want, despite the hardships, to stay in the business. In fact, the recently released results of a University of Florida survey confirm that most growers whose citrus groves were damaged during the freeze will and are making a recovery effort. More than two-thirds of the citrus growers in the hard hit northern tier of the Citrus Belt plan to rejuvenate or replant their freeze damaged grove according to the university's institute of food and agricultural sciences [IFAS].

The Florida citrus industry, throughout its lengthy history, has proven its economic value to the State of Florida and the Nation. I believe, with some assistance, the recent setbacks can be put behind us and the industry will continue its contribution to the quality of life in this country and the rest of the world.●

THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF PEORIA'S 150TH BIRTHDAY

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the First Presbyterian Church of Peoria is celebrating its 150th birthday this year.

This institution has long been an important part of the Peoria community. The present congregation has worshipped in the current structure since 1888. This is the fourth building used by the congregation.

During the tense period preceding the Civil War, Jonathon Cooper, a member of First Presbyterian and mayor of Peoria, wrote to Abraham Lincoln to invite him to debate Stephen Douglas in Peoria. The congregation has the handwritten invitation, a historic document which is a link to our community's and our Nation's past.

In 1863 the general assembly, the governing body of the Presbyterian Church, met in Peoria, the first time they had convened west of Ohio.

Both the clergy and the congregation have played important roles in national affairs. Pastor Newell Dwight Hillis served in Peoria in the late 1880's and later went on to Plymouth Congregational Church in New York. The Government sent him on a speaking tour during World War I and he raised $100 million for liberty bonds in 37 days, surely one of the most successful fundraising efforts in American history and a tribute to Pastor Hillis' patriotism and eloquence.

Edward D. Gates, pastor from 1948-56, received several Freedom Foundation Awards. Robert P. Gates, pastor from 1958-81, had several sermons read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. During World War II, when William Atkinson Young was the pastor, services were broadcast nationally as the CBS Church on the Air.

I am honored to say that I have had the privilege to be a member of the choir at the First Presbyterian Church. It is, therefore, a personal pleasure for me to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the 150th birthday of the First Presbyterian Church of Peoria.●

THE GREAT FARM BELT BANK CRISIS

HON. ED JONES

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues an article from the December 30, 1984, Washington Post, entitled "The Great Farm Belt Bank Crisis." This guest editorial is coauthored by two gentlemen whom I have known for a number of years, and have called on frequently to present testimony to my House Agriculture Subcommittee on issues involving agricultural credit. Mr. Thomas H. Olson is president of the Lisco State Bank, in Lisco, NE, and also serves as chairman of the Agriculture Committee of the Independent Bankers Association of America. Mr. Weldon Barton is the Washington, DC, agricultural representative for the association.

Mr. Olson and Mr. Barton present a sobering look at the current financial stress which has spread throughout the agricultural lending sector. Much has been written about the tragic economic conditions which have swept across the farm belt and engulfed thousands of family farmers over the past 3 years. Now we are beginning to see warning signals that a similar fate may be in store for many rural credit institutions which are heavy into farm lending. More commercial banks failed in 1984 than in any year since the Great Depression, and for the first time in its history the Cooperative Farm Credit System experienced liquidations among its production credit associations.

I applaud Mr. Olson and Mr. Barton for having the courage to speak out and reveal the extent to which their industry is suffering at this time, and I commend them for challenging the Government to adopt an agriculture policy in 1985 which faces up to its responsibilities by helping balance farm production with demand. I appreciate their candid assessment of the problem, and I urge my colleagues to consider the economic consequences of a continued agriculture depression. The current stress among farm lenders and other related agribusinesses will only spread to other sectors of our economy unless dramatic steps are taken soon.

THE GREAT FARM-BELT BANK CRISIS

IF AGRICULTURE COLLAPSES, SO WILL OUR FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

(By Thomas H. Olson and Weldon Barton)

A rapidly growing debt crisis is looming across this nation's farm belt, one that threatens the very existance of hundreds of American banks and thus poses great dangers to the national financial system. Already, banks in rural America are failing at a higher rate than at any time since the Depression. But little had been done to cope with this problem.

The farm debt problem has been building since 1980-81. During these few years the value of farm land, farm machinery and other capital assets has plummeted by nearly a third nationwide, and by 50 percent or more in some locations. Of an estimated total farm debt of $215 billion, about $60-70 billion is owed by farmers whose debt exceeds 70 percent of their total assets. These people are the ones who would have to sell out if forced to meet their obligations at current payment schedules. If a wave of liquidations happened, land prices could collapse, and the money the acreage brought might not be sufficient to pay off the banks.

Agricultural banks were not pushed to the breaking point in abnormally large numbers until the middle of 1984. Twenty-two of the 40 banks that failed since June 15 were agricultural banks; they had an average of 53 percent of their total loans in agricultural credits. Most of them are located in the Great Plains states: five in Nebraska, four in Kansas, three in Iowa, two each Oklahoma and Colorado. The rest were scattered elsewhere.

These numbers could balloon in 1985. There are about 4,300 U.S. banks that have at least 25 percent of their loan portfolios in agricultural loans, and 1,700 with 50 percent in farm loans. there are also about 850 local production credit associations and land bank associations in the federal Farm Credit System which specialize in agricultural lending. Seven of those local farm credit institutions are currently in liquidation—the equivalency of a commerical bank failure.

As long as "slack" remained in the overall credit system, banks and farm credit institutions could use a number of techniques to hold off trouble. They could consolidate farmers' short-term debt into longer-term obligations with lower payments. Credit institutions holding long-term debt secured by land and other fixed assets often "subordinated" their position to a bank which extended short-term operating credit to the same farmer, giving that bank priority access to the farmer's marketing receipts. This practice enabled farmers to secure annual operating capital, and at least postpone the liquidation of fixed assets.

Creditors have often practiced "forbearance" and in effect tolerated a farmer's inability to repay a loan on schedule, as long as the loan remained adequately collateralized. That was possible for a while after farm capital assets began to decline in value, partly because banks often required farmers to put up collateral substantially higher than the loan itself.

But such techniques are fast becoming impossible, as the agricultural credit systems is now tightening almost exponentially. Most ominous of all, the value of farmers' principal asset, their land, may be headed for further dramatic declines. According to Federal Reserve Board economist Emanuel Melichar, the total value of American farmland grew by $465 billion (in 1983 dollars) from 1971-79, and fell by about $149 billion from 1980-83. He says that the remainder of the gains made in '71-'79 may be wiped out in the years ahead as prices for farmland continue to fall.

The arithmetic explaining an agricultural bank's solvency threshold is rather simple. Assume a situation that would be roughly typical for perhaps 1,500 banks across the farm belt.

The bank has $100 million of deposits to invest in loans and other assets (such as municipal bonds). Of this $100 million, about $36 million is loaned out to some 200 farmers—an average debt per borrower of $180,000. The bank is capitalized at 9 percent of deposits, or $9 million, which is $3.5 million more than the minimum required by the regulatory agencies (5.5 percent of assets). This cushion against losses consists mainly of funds accumulated over the years from earnings and the bank's common stock.

If 20 of the bank's $180,000 farm loans are classified by the regulators as unlikely to be collected, they would be treated as losses. But subtracting $3.6 million from the bank's $9 million in capital would wipe out the bank's cushion and bring it below the legal minimum. At that point the bank is legally subject to closing unless corrective action is taken.

Since the average capital level of the approximately 4,300 agricultural banks is about 9 prcent of assets, the bank has, in effect, borrowed $10 out of every $11 it has loaned or invested. That makes it extremely difficult for the banks to withstand a run of farm failures among their customers. Even if a bank wants to be indulgent, it has to worry about its own creditors, who are unlikely to be so sympathetic.

Just as the situation is getting really perilous for the banks, however, the government agencies that might alleviate the situation are either tending to withdraw from involvement or to clamp down rather precipitously.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and the comptroller of the currency have increased regulatory pressures on banks for downward reappraisal of farmland and pushed for classifying more farm loans in "problem" categories. The Farmers Home Administration has basically closed its loan window as "lender of last resort" to commercially financed farmers who are in trouble. The secretary of agriculture is advocating a "free-market" approach to basic agricultural policies that would allow the USDA to sidestep the responsibility for helping to stabilize the receding agricultural economy.

These government policies all accentuate the negative psychology in the agricultural sector.

FDIC Chairman William Isaac said recently that the bank regulators' list of about 800 "problem" banks is growing because agricultural banks are being added faster than non-agricultural banks are being taken off. Chairman Isaac added, however, that the growing difficulties among farm banks do not pose a "threat" to the banking system as a whole.

The implication is that there are much larger problems to be concerned about. But what about the circles of misery and disruption engulfing local communities when an agricultural banks fails? What if the gathering crisis in 1985 forces wide-spread liquidations, inundating the weak markets for farmland in a dozen states and carrying in its wake hundreds of additional failures?

This gathering crisis deserves the kind of highest-level, concerted attention which has been devoted to the foreign debt crisis. Instead of preaching "free-market," the government should be facing up to its responsibilities. The crippling impact of budget deficits on our farm economy must be faced. The government cannot avoid its responsibility to provide essential direction to balance production of farm commodities and demand for them.

There is no serious prospect that the agricultural economy can "grow its way" out of the current debt crisis through export expansion. A multiyear agricultural stabilization policy should be negotiated and enacted by Congress in 1985, when the farm bill has to be rewritten.

Yes, the agricultural sector does face a serious "shakeout"—an inevitable consequence of the excesses of the '70s, when inflation took control of our farm sector and distorted it wildly. But the shakeout must be managed with great care, or else the repercussions will be felt far beyond the small rural communities whose banks are now in trouble.●

NATIONAL DRUG EDUCATION ACT OF 1985

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today the National Drug Education Act of 1985. My proposal represents many years of work and interest in the problem of drug abuse.

As my colleagues may remember, I have spent years working with State, Federal, and local officials to stop the flow of illegal drugs into the United States, and especially my native Texas. As a former county sheriff, I formed a 10-county wide drug task force to try to stop the flow of drugs from Mexico. During the past 2 years as a member of the House Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, I have spent many hours listening to testimony from law enforcement officials, psychologists and counselors, and educators about drug abuse and what can be done to prevent it. Last year I worked closely with parent teacher associations, parents of drug users, and education agencies to formulate a comprehensive bill that would address these problems. Although no action was taken on my bill in the 98th Congress, I have decided to reintroduce it this year and urge the Education and Labor Committee to take action on it.

I am very grateful for the many comments and suggestions I received from groups around the country who support this bill. There is a national network that has developed to help children with drug and alcohol problems. The assistance and support I received from these groups has been invaluable in spreading the word about my bill. Their comments have been incorporated into this revised bill, which I believe have made it stronger and more appealing to my colleagues in the Congress.

My proposal would provide $30 million over 3 years to the States through a block grant. States would apply for funds to the Department of Health and Human Services and funds would be disbursed on the basis of population. The Federal Government would provide 75 percent of the funds, the States 20 percent, and local school districts 5 percent—which could be in-kind payments such as facilities or equipment.

I believe very strongly that this bill is needed because it targets elementary and junior high school students who may not have experimented yet with drugs, cigarettes, and alcohol. In addition, it recognizes there is a link between cigarettes and alcohol and the use of drugs. The bill recognizes that education is more effective than either law enforcement or treatment and prevention techniques in stopping drug, alcohol, and cigarette use.

Much of the basis for these premises comes from a detailed, articulate, and thoughtful study published by the Rand Corp. entitled "Strategies for Controlling Adolescent Drug Use." I recommend this book very highly, and hope that my colleagues who share my concern about substance abuse will ask me for a copy of this publication.

There are seven reasons why I believe this bill is needed. I urge my colleagues to consider these points and join me in cosponsoring this legislation. I am confident that there is still time to reach many children who have not yet begun to experiment with drugs.

First, I believe this proposal is worthwhile because it targets a special group of children who have traditionally been ignored by drug education programs in the past. There is growing evidence that drug, cigarette, and alcohol awareness programs aimed at elementary school children can be very effective. These programs can reach children who have heard about drugs but who have not yet used them. A comprehensive awareness program can dispel the myths about cigarette smoking, drinking, and drugs, and give children the right information that will help them resist the temptation to experiment. It is clear that one program aimed at children from 4th to 12th grade cannot possibly be effective. However, by tailoring these programs and encouraging children in elementary and junior high schools to learn about cigarettes, alcohol, and drugs, we may be forestalling children from making one of the most serious mistakes of their lives.

Second, effective programs at all age levels stress the importance of peer pressure. The Rand study cited before notes that previous education programs failed because they were grounded in incorrect assumptions about why adolescents begin using these substances. New studies indicate that drug use begins in a group setting among peers or relatives and is often perceived as the adult thing to do. Peer pressure and the imitation effect are very strong influences on impressionable children. Statistics indicate, too, that young people of all ages and socioeconomic classes use cigarettes, alcohol, and drugs, even children in grade school. A nationwide survey indicates that 50 percent of our fourth graders believe their peers have experimented with drugs, and 25 percent report significant peer pressure to try drugs or alcohol. To date, Federal, State, and local governments have spent huge sums to detect and apprehend producers and distributors and to treat addicts. But insufficient moneys have been spent on what the Rand study considers the most effective method of curbing drug abuse: education. I believe the evidence is conclusive that a comprehensive education program aimed at the real reasons children use cigarettes, alcohol, and drugs—peer pressure—can be very effective.

A third reason I believe my proposal is needed is because it focuses attention on the relationship between cigarettes and alcohol and the use of drugs. The Rand study provides compelling new evidence that links cigarette smoking among children to early drug use. The authors carefully examined the circumstances that lead young people to experiment with cigarettes, drugs, and alcohol, and concluded that "the same factors that lead to cigarette smoking lead to drug use." The study noted that "generally, an adolescent begins drug use with cigarettes or alcohol. Later, he or she may use marijuana, and still later may go on to other drugs. In effect, each stage appears to be a prerequisite for the others. Therefore, stopping or delaying the onset of marijuana use and cigarette smoking may prevent use of later-stage drugs." This is a powerful conclusion which contradicts the myth among children that there is no connection between cigarettes, alcohol, and drug use.

Therefore, educators are now suggesting a new approach to preventing first use of drugs by focusing on cigarette smoking and taking into account the social pressures that youngsters feel to experiment with cigarettes, alcohol, and drugs.

This special attention on cigarettes and alcohol is important because data demonstrate a clear relation between smoking cigarettes and using marijuana and other drugs. For example, among all teenagers in 1983, current cigarette smokers were 11 times more likely to be current marijuana users and 14 times more likely than nonsmokers to be current users of heroin, cocaine, and/or hallucinogens. At least 1 in every 16 high school seniors is actively smoking marijuana on a daily basis, and fully 1 in 5 has done so for at least a month at some time in their lives.

Alcohol is also being abused by our young people. About 1 in 16 seniors is drinking alcohol daily, and 41 percent have had 5 or more drinks in a row at least once in the past 2 weeks. An estimated 3.3 million drinking youths aged 14 to 17 are showing signs that they may develop serious alcohol-related problems. Drunk driving is the leading cause of death among 15 to 24 year olds.

These statistics are shocking and have helped focus attention on the seriousness of alcohol and tobacco abuse.

A fourth factor my bill considers is drug use among minority students. Poor and minority students frequently do not have the money to buy conventional drugs, and therefore use nontraditional substances, such as inhalants, as a means of getting high. My bill requires that educators recognize these practices and address the special needs of these students. This is particularly a problem for American Indian and Hispanic children across the Southwest and in our inner cities. It is imperative that educators recognize the role that these nontraditional stimulants play among minority children.

Fifth, our country has spent billions of dollars to try and stop the flow of illegal drugs into the United States. There is also the cost to society in nonbudgetary expenses. For instance, drug abuse costs this Nation $100 billion annually, of which an astonishing $70 to $80 billion is attributable to drug-related crime and corruption, and $15 to $20 billion is attributable to the impact of drug abusers on the health care, law enforcement, and judicial systems, the employment market, and the general welfare and social service systems. The annual financial burden of alcoholism and alcohol problems is about $120 billion each year. We cannot afford this drain on our economy and judicial system. A prevention and awareness program begun at an early age can have a lifetime effect, not only for the children, but also for our entire society.

Sixth, this proposal requires that decisions about awareness and education programs are best made at the local level. Therefore, the Department of Health and Human Services would disburse the money to the States according to the population. The State and local educational agencies would contribute 30 percent of the cost of the programs. The local educational agency receiving these moneys must develop a drug, alcohol, and tobacco educational program that meets the following criteria:

Assesses the problems and current educational programs, if any, designed to address such problems;

Outlines specific plans for providing or improving instruction on drug, alcohol, and tobacco use;

Describes the goals that are to be achieved by the drug education program, and provide an annual report on progress in obtaining these goals;

Estimates the cost of the program and gives assurances that the local educational agency will pay 5 percent of the program's cost; and Provides procedures to ensure a proper accounting of Federal funds paid to the applicant under this act.

I believe this will provide the Federal Government with the necessary assurances that the money is well spent and will give local school districts the opportunity to tailor its programs to the specific needs of the children in their communities.

Finally, the bill would require that schools use all the resources at their disposal to teach children about substance abuse. That means that local law enforcement officials, Federal narcotics agents, and others involved in stopping the sale of drugs should talk with students. Psychologists and drug counselors who treat addicts should tell students what drug abuse is really about and how it affects their health and well-being. And, finally, clergymen, parents, businessmen, and any others with experience in drug education should be brought together with students to discuss what tobacco, alcohol, and drug abuse does to the individual and his family. These are important resources that can complement the classroom text training and make the evil of substance abuse more real for the students.

I have been very encouraged by the broad bipartisan support my proposal received in the 98th Congress. I feel confident that the bill I am introducing today will receive favorable consideration by my colleagues on the Education and Labor Committee. I urge those who share my concern about cigarette, alcohol, and drug abuse to review my proposal and join me in cosponsoring it.●

SKIN CANCER PREVENTION AND DETECTION WEEK

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation designating

March 24 through March 30, 1985, as "National Skin Cancer Prevention and Detection Week." I am delighted that as of today, 47 of my colleagues have joined as original cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 85.

Cancer of the skin is the most prevalent of all forms of cancer, with nearly 400,000 new cases reported each year. Advances in treatment have dramatically lessened the incidence of death from most skin cancers, although scarring and deformity are often lasting reminders. With the exception of malignant melanoma, an uncommon but very serious form of the disease, the overall cure rate for skin cancer is higher that 90 percent. Sadly, at least two-thirds of the 5,000 to 6,000 reported skin cancer deaths a year result from melanoma.

While repeated overexposure to the ultraviolet rays of the Sun is the principal cause of skin cancer, and those residing in the southern most regions of the Nation are most susceptible, no one is immune.

Recognizing the seriousness of melanoma, the National Cancer Institute and the Office of Medical Application of Research at the National Institutes of Health [NIH] sponsored early last year a consensus conference regarding precursors to malignant melanoma. The members of the NIH consensus development panel, including some of the most outstanding biomedical researchers in the Nation, concluded that while the incidence of melanoma and related deaths is increasing, there is evidence that early detection and surgical removal of melanoma make this a highly curable cancer.

The American Cancer Society remarks in its skin cancer literature that cancer specialists worldwide are improving diagnostic techniques, learning more about early cancer and developing more effective combinations of treatments. The American Cancer Society urges a concerted effort toward alerting the American public and the medical profession to early recognition signs signaling the need for prompt treatment. This is the key to skin cancer prevention.

To this end, the American Academy of Dermatology, with its 6,700 physician members and nearly 100 local and State dermatological societies across the United States, will be sponsoring free melanoma/skin cancer prevention and detection centers across the country this spring. The dermatologists and volunteers at these national health fairs will offer their services in detecting skin cancers as well as in teaching skin self-examination techniques for melanoma developed for the America Cancer Society by the American Academy of Dermatology.

It is my hope that by designating the week coinciding with many of these health fairs as "National Skin Cancer Prevention and Detection Week," Congress will help heighten public sensitivity to the prevalence of skin cancer and the importance of early detection in our efforts to prevent spread of the disease. This resolution has the enthusiastic endorsement of the American Medical Association, the American College of Chemosurgery, the American Academy of Dermatology, and other major dermatology organizations. I urge my colleagues to join me in this worthy effort.●

INTRODUCTION OF THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT—99TH CONGRESS

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I have today, on the first day of the 99th Congress, introduced the equal rights amendment.

Notwithstanding the fact that our initial efforts to have this important concept incorporated in our Constitution did not meet success, we must continue the struggle. The issues and problems that gave birth to this movement are no less real today. We have made progress toward equal opportunity for women; but I fear that our achievements are not yet sufficient.

We must not permit our efforts to diminish, for despite the progress, women today still suffer from discrimination in employment, in education, in pensions, and in many other areas. We must make certain, once and for all, that, "Equality of rights under the law shall not be abridged by any State on account of sex."

Today I am reintroducing the equal rights amendment to send a message that the march toward constitutional guarantee of equal rights for all Americans goes forward.●

THE CIVIL LIBERTIES ACT OF 1985

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join our distinguished majority leader JIM WRIGHT and many others of our colleagues to introduce the Civil Liberties Act of 1985.

Now, more than 40 years later, Congress has the opportunity to close the books on one of the most shameful events in our history: The internment beginning in 1942 of 120,000 loyal Americans without trial or jury, simply on the basis of their ethnic ancestry.

During the 98th Congress, this legislation was H.R. 4110. Our new bill, identical in substance to the 98th Congress legislation, will be H.R. 442. This number honors the 442d Regimental Combat Team, which has been called the most highly decorated unit in the history of American fighting forces. The 442d was made up of Americans of Japanese ancestry, many of whom volunteered for duty from the internment camps that are the subject of H.R. 442. The 442d fought with great distinction throughout the European campaign of World War II.

The men of the 442d, along with those Americans of Japanese ancestry who served with distinction with the Military Intelligence Service [MIS] in the Pacific Theater, fought with courage and bravery to defend their Nation, to defend their homeland, the United States of America.

Those interned were not foreign spies carrying briefcases bulging with secrets. Many had sons or brothers fighting with the 442d or the MIS. Among those who were interned were old men and women who worked in the fields of California, and with their hard labor made barren lands productive, lands that many would lose as a result of the internment. These were not unscrupulous agents of a foreign power, these were business people who had worked to build up small businesses and to be full members of their communities. These were not recent immigrants of uncertain loyalty. Most of those interned were born in this country and were proud citizens from birth.

It is impossible to debate appropriate remedies for something as indefensible as the internment without first understanding the total tragedy of our Government's policies, the needless injustice that the internment represented.

I was one of those interned. I was 10 years old. If someone, anyone, could show me how by any stretch of the imagination, any reasonable person could suspect me to have been a security threat, I would abandon this effort instantly.

The fact remains that no Americans of Japanese ancestry committed any acts of treason or disloyalty.

The internment was not merely inconvenient. Evacuated with little notice, thousands of Americans lost their homes, their businesses, their farms. We lost nearly 3 years of our lives. The financial losses were enormous. But the losses of friends, education, opportunity, and standing in our communities were incalculable.

My own family was sent first to Santa Anita Racetrack. We showered in the horse paddocks. Some families lived in converted stables, others in hastily thrown together barracks. We were then moved to Heart Mountain, WY, where our entire family lived in one small room of a rude tarpaper barrack.

Some say the internment was for our own protection. But even as a boy of 10 I could see that the machine guns and the barbed wire faced inward.

The internment was not, as some say, "regrettable but understandable." It was unjustified in light of what we know now and unjustified in light of what anyone who wanted to see the situation clearly could see at the time. The internment was a mistake, an act of prejudice and fear. This whole Nation was and still is shamed by it.

Yes; it was a time of great national stress. But moral principles and rules of law are easy to uphold in placid times. But do these principles stand up in times of great difficulty and stress? That is the test of a great Nation: Can it stand by its laws and codes even while threatened? Sadly, we as a Nation failed that test in 1942.

Chiseled in the marble over the entrance of our Supreme Court, it does not say "Equal Justice Under Law Except When Things Get Sticky." If our constitutional promises of equal treatment and due process mean what they say, then there can be no excuse for the internment. What had I done that made me so threatening to my Government? Murderers, arsonists, even assassins, and spies get trials. But not young boys born and raised in San Jose, CA, who happen to have odd sounding last names. Is that what this Nation is about?

Congress enacted legislation in 1942 to implement the internment, and it is now up to Congress to demonstrate our national capacity for justice and wisdom. Let us show the strength of our Nation and our system of laws by admitting the errors of 1942, apologizing for those errors, and making some efforts toward redressing the damage we have done. Moreover, let us state clearly and unequivocally our commitment that such a wholesale abuse of civil rights will never again happen in this land.

We in Congress began this process of national reconciliation with the creation in 1980 of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians.

Following their excellent historical study, the Commission recommended appropriate remedies for the injustices of the internment. Those recommendations are the basis of the bill being introduced today.

In brief, these recommendations include a national apology; measures to correct legal and administrative actions that were part of the Nation's discriminatory activities at that time; the creation of a civil liberties public education fund for educational and community projects; and the payment from that fund of $20,000 to each surviving internee.

Similar recommendations were also made by the Commission to redress the damages done to the Native Aleuts who were evacuated from their islands in 1942. Those recommendations are the basis for the Aleut provisions of this legislation, which parallel the provisions of S. 2116 of the 98th Congress.

I look forward to discussing these recommendations in detail with my colleagues. I believe they constitute a fair, balanced, and reasonable package.

In speaking about the internment, our distiguished Majority Leader had in the past quoted Abraham Lincoln. Let me in closing repeat that passage.

"Those who would deny freedom to others do not deserve it themselves, and, under a just God, they will not retain it long." Thank you.

SUMMARY OF H.R. 442

Congress acknowledges the fundamental injustice of the internment, apologizes for it, and seeks to prevent the reoccurrence of any similar events.

AS REGARDS AMERICANS OF JAPANESE ANCESTRY

1. On behalf of the nation, the Congress apologizes to those Americans of Japanese ancestry who were interned.

2. The President is requested to offer pardons to those convicted of violating laws during the internment period, whose violation was based on a refussal to accept racially discriminatory treatment.

3. When reviewing requests for review of administrative rulings relating to the internment, executive agencies are asked to review such cases with liberality, giving full consideration to the findings of the Commission and Congress.

4. A trust fund of $1.5 billion is authorized for educational and humanitarian purposes, and Board of Directors is created to manage the fund.

5. Out of the trust fund, the Attorney General shall pay $20,000 in compensation to each surviving internee.

AS REGARDS AMERICANS OF ALEUT ANCESTRY

1. A trust fund of $5 million is authorized for community, educational and cultural programs benefitting the Aleuts, and a Board of Directors is created to manage the fund.

2. Each of the survivors of the Aleut interment shall receive $12,000 in compensation.

3. Churches and community centers destroyed in World War II shall be rebuilt.

4. Hazardous debris remaining from World War II shall be cleared away from the Aleutian Islands.

5. The Island of Attu shall be returned to the native corporation, provided that the Coast Guard will be able to continue its use of the Island.●

BROKER DEPOSITS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation to limit the amount of short-term broker deposits which may be accepted by any insured depository institution. The legislation is identical to H.R. 5913, introduced during the 98th Congress. It is a fair and balanced attempt to set guidelines for the use of brokered funds.

Among the Broker Deposit Limitation Act's most important aspects is the establishment of a cap of 15 percent on the amount of brokered funds any one institution may hold. This is calculated as 15 percent of the total deposits of the institution. Troubled institutions are prohibited from accepting short-term broker funds.

In addition, the bill requires monthly reporting of brokered deposit activity and limits any individual broker to no more than 5 percent of the total deposits of the insured bank.

The reforms contained in this bill address the potential and actual abuses of brokered funds while recognizing the benefits they can provide when properly planned by brokers and prudently managed by recipient banks and thrifts. A recent report released by the House Committee on Government Operations presents further evidence of the usefulness of broker funds and questions the more severe restrictions being sought by the regulators.

It is my intention to include this legislation as part of any larger banking bill which may come before the Congress this session. The bill is being introduced with the cosponsorship of Representative CHARLES SCHUMER and Representative DOUG BARNARD.●

NATIONAL LEGION OF VALOR DAY

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to rise today to introduce a joint resolution to designate August 4, 1985 as "National Legion of Valor Day".

The Legion of Valor, originally founded as the Medal of Honor Legion back in 1890—almost a century ago—has brought together distinguished Americans from across the country who have received our Nation's highest decorations for valor in defense of liberty and freedom: The Medal of Honor of the Navy, the Air Force and the Army, and the Distinguished Service Cross, Navy Cross, and Air Force Cross.

This August 4th marks the 30th anniversary of the granting of a congressional charter to the Legion of Valor. That recognition was well deserved. However, the men and women of the Legion of Valor have never been content to sit on their laurels and stop serving our country upon their discharge from the military services; true to form, they continue to serve honorably today, taking part in community activities and veterans services.

I therefore invite my colleagues to join me in commemorating the 30th anniversary of the congressional charter and in thanking the men and women of the Legion who have demonstrated extraordinary heroism in combat, risking their lives for others so that they might be free.

The resolution follows:

Whereas August 4, 1985, marks the 30th anniversary of the granting of the Congressional charter to the Legion of Valor of the United States of America, Inc.;

Whereas membership in the Legion of Valor is reserved for the recipients of our Nation's highest decorations for valor: the Medal of Honor of the Navy, the Army and the Air Force, and the Distinguished Service Cross, Navy Cross, and Air Force Cross;

Whereas the Medal of Honor is awarded for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of life above and beyond the call of duty;

Whereas the Army, Navy, and Air Force Crosses are awarded for extraordinary heroism in connection with military operations against an armed enemy;

Whereas the efforts and sacrifices of the recipients of these decorations for valor inspire their comrades and all Americans to be a force for liberty and freedom: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the August 4, 1985, is hereby designated "National Legion of Valor Day". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon all Federal, State, and local government agencies and people of the United States, to observe the day with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.●

ANNA M. SAMPLE: COMMUNITY LEADER

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the life of a distinguished resident of Camden, NJ, Anna M. Sample. Ms. Sample was a clear example of the "American Dream," someone who began her life in poverty, and who overcame adversity to become a community leader and receive acclaim from distinguished organizations and persons.

Born on May 7, 1931, Anna Sample began her life of dedication. Having dropped out of high school in the 11th grade, she eventually obtained her GED and went on to attend Camden County College. At an early age, Anna's mother passed away, an experience which strengthened and reinforced her strong belief in family and community.

She began her community work as a volunteer for the Camden County Council on Economic Opportunity, a private, nonprofit agency designated by the Governor of New Jersey as the official community action agency serving low-income persons in Camden County. She held several staff positions with that organization, and in 1973 was appointed executive director.

But Anna Sample's work did not end with that accomplishment. Her dedication and concern for people instilled in her the will to become a board member and vice president of the National Community Action Executive Director's Association; a member of the Executive Committee of the southern New Jersey Health Systems Agency; a board member of CAMCARE Health Corp., and an active participant in the city of Camden Manpower Advisory Committee and the Private Industry Council.

Anna was also a driving force behind, and a board member of the Community Planning and Advocacy Council/Human Service Coalition, which has grown to encompass over 250 human services providers. On July 26, 1984, the CPAC Board of Trustees bestowed upon Anna one of her proudest honors, unanimously electing her honorary president of that organization.

Along with her devotion to her community, Anna Sample was equally devoted to her family. The mother of 10, Anna wanted the fruits of her labor to be a legacy to her children. When Anna Sample died on August 20, 1984, the tributes that followed indicated the depth of her commitment to both community and family.

The program distributed at her funeral service was entitled "Service of Triumph for Anna M. Sample." Indeed, hers was a life of triumph—over adversity, bureaucratic insensitivity and poverty. The Camden City Council paid fitting tribute to the life of Anna Sample when it stated in its commemorative resolution:

Whereas, during the life of Anna M. Sample, she did devote many hours and sacrificed her time and physical efforts to the spiritual and physical well being of her fellow citizens. Her loss will be deeply felt by the community and by this government for many individuals profited spiritually and economically by her counselling and service . . .

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that my colleagues will join me in paying tribute to the life of a truly outstanding community leader and a fine American, Ms. Anna Sample.●

SPACE WEAPONS OR ARMS CONTROL?

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, the willingness of the administration to discuss space weapons with the Soviet Union in the upcoming meeting in Geneva, between Secretary of State George Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko, will be critical to the success of these negotiations and indicative of the commitment of the administration to pursue arms control negotiations. I congratulate the President for pursuing this dialog with the Soviets. My colleagues and I will certainly monitor the progress of these, and subsequent meetings, closely.

The possibility of the extension of the arms race into space was the subject of great public and congressional debate in the 98th Congress. This issue will command even greater scrutiny in the 99th Congress, as the defense budget for space weapons programs grows the one hand, and, as arms control negotiations evolve between the United States and the Soviet Union on the other hand.

My colleagues know that I support the military use of space, and have for a long time, where that use contributes to global security and stability. The United States has long depended on space for communications, early warning of nuclear attack, intelligence collection, monitoring of military activities worldwide, and arms control verification. These activities have contributed significantly to peace by denying the element of surprise in attack, and improving command and control of military forces on Earth.

However, the placement of weapons in space for ballistic-missile defense or for shooting down Soviet satellites would be a mistake. Ballistic-missile defense is explicitly prohibited by the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty and would be fantastically expensive, would promote an accelerated nuclear arms race, and, intended or not, could be viewed by the Soviets as a U.S. first-strike system. Last year, the House expressed skepticism over the President's Strategic Defense Initiative, or "Star Wars," by cutting the budget request by almost 30 percent. The fiscal year 1986 request will certainly come under even closer budget scrutiny as a result of the strong pressure to reduce the deficit and the need to find a more workable approach to national security.

Although strategic defense systems are still in the research stage, the antisatellite [ASAT] weapon under development by the Air Force could be deployed within a few years. ASAT's are designed to destroy the military satellites upon which the United States depends for vital military functions. The United States would therefore have more at risk in an ASAT arms race than the Soviet Union because of the nature of our space assets, and because we depend more on our space systems than the Soviets do on theirs.

Last year, the House supported a moratorium on testing of the U.S. antisatellite weapon system in the hopes that an agreement could be reached with the Soviet Union to ban the weapon. In light of the January 7 meeting between Andrei Gromyko and Secretary of State George Shultz, and the possibility of resumption of arms control negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union, I believe that an extension of the moratorium is critical to successful negotiations. This is because the value of the U.S. ASAT as bargaining leverage would diminish as the testing program proceeds. It is my intention to seek an extension of the ASAT test moratorium now due to expire on March 1, 1985 following Presidential certification.

Finally, foremost on our minds as we embark upon the 99th Congress and begin consideration of funding for Federal programs will be the problem of the deficit, projected to be in the $200 billion range next year. Under these circumstances defense spending, which has enjoyed an unprecedented buildup over the last 4 years, averaging 9 percent growth after inflation, will inevitably have to come under even closer budget scrutiny.

We all recognize the need to slow down the growth in Department of Defense spending. This will make it much more difficult to gain support for new programs, such as the $25 billion sought for the Strategic Defense Initiative Research Program. A fully deployed ballistic-missile defense program, by many estimates, would cost between one-half of a trillion and 1 trillion dollars, at least. The General Accounting Office has projected that the ASAT weapon alone will cost in the "tens of billions of dollars". The problem is compounded by the fact that, to a large extent, outyear defense spending has already been determined with the approval of major weapon systems like the B-1 bomber, the Trident, and the Pershing, to name a few, thus leaving little flexibility in the budget.

Mr. Speaker, the debate over the Strategic Defense Initiative and antisatellite weapons has raised serious questions about the enormous cost of these systems, their viability, and their negative effect on arms control. I intend to continue to examine the questions raised, and take action where necessary. I know that many of my colleagues share my concerns, and I welcome their active participation. I also believe that the President recognizes the serious danger of our nuclear age, and that he has asked himself how he can contribute to reducing that danger. I share his views about this danger, and pledge to lend my efforts towards the goal of a safer world.

Thank you Mr. Speaker. An excellent article on space weapons appearing in the Los Angeles Times follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Dec. 26, 1984]

WEAPONS IN SPACE

How long can the world hope to gaze into space with any confidence that no weapons lurk there? Longer than it might have thought a year ago, but still not long enough. The case is growing against two very different programs, both of which would turn outer space into a target range. Next year will tell whether the case is strong enough to stop either. It also will tell whether they are the shortcut to a deal on arms control that Washington thinks they are. We doubt it.

The more glamorous of the two is President Reagan's "Star Wars" program—his personal gamble that the threat of being destroyed by a counterattack is neither the best nor the only way to prevent a nuclear nation from starting a war. In one of its many forms it is a shield laced together with forerunners of the Battleship Galactica that would shoot down Soviet missiles as they left their launching pads and long before they could reach a target. Because the technology for such a system is now and may for generations lie beyond human reach, the idea is in such disrepute inside and outside the Administration that even its defenders are trying to calculate its salvage value, perhaps as an arms-control bargaining chip. Even Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger, who once held out hope that the system would put a missile-proof umbrella over the entire nation, retreated last week. "Star Wars" would be worth pursuing, he said, even if it meant only that an enemy who could not be sure how many missiles would get through a shield might be discouraged from launching any at all. What was once a promise of protection is now a prayer that the country might get lucky.

Congress in the meantime has imposed a brief moratorium against the final testing of the other program, the Pentagon's less-glamorous satellite-killers. Built around small missiles launched like darts from fighter planes, the system would destroy orbiting satellites that the Soviets use the same way the United States uses its own satellites—as listening posts, communications stations and spies in the sky. The satellite-killer program is the more insidious of the two programs because it is technically possible, it is close to being declared an operational weapon system far better than anything similar on the Soviet side and, once deployed, it would almost certainly launch not only its small missiles but also a new arms race in outer space.

Because the Soviet Union has agitated globally against both programs, publicly and in private meetings with Americans, some U.S. defense theorists assume that Washington's threat to proceed with both projects is what coaxed the Soviets back into arms-control talks that will begin Jan. 7 in Geneva. They also assume that the Soviets would give up large numbers of its intercontinental missiles in return for a presidential signature on a treaty banning or somehow limiting weapons in space.

There are other possible explanations of the Soviet willingness to talk. Further testing of either system would push existing arms treaties to their limits. That being the case, it is as logical to assume that the Soviets are less interested in trading weapons that they have for weapons that we are still developing than in getting a better sense of how far the United States plans to proceed with space weapons. Then they would know better when to start working seriously on projects of their own that might defeat "Star Wars" and compete with satellite-killers.

Despite the programs' differences, there are overlaps in them that would make it hard to negotiate on one and ignore the other. Some anti-satellite research and testing would be useful in the early stages of a "Star Wars" program, and even a crude system for shooting down nuclear missiles in flight could be a very effective satellite-killer.

The threat of "Star Wars" and satellite-killers may indeed be the reason that Soviet negotiators will turn up in Geneva next year, ignoring their own promises not to talk about nuclear weapons while Pershing 2 missiles are in Europe. But that would not make the American projects bargaining chips.

The strongest argument against "Star Wars" is that decades from now any system in which the United States invested sums estimated as high as $500 billion would leak around the edges. It could not cope with bombers. It could not stop missiles launched from submarines. And the main defense weapons could be overwhelmed by what the Soviet Union does best—building more missiles than the shield was designed to stop.

That is the practical argument against "Star Wars." The conceptual argument is that it works directly against Reagan's declared goal—an absolute reduction of nuclear warheads in the world. With "Star Wars," the incentive would be to build more, not throw away any ready to launch.

It seems clear that arms-control talks in Geneva and in subsequent meetings will succeed only if they get down to basics—to searching for a formula that would reduce the threat of nuclear war by reducing the number of nuclear missiles and warheads in both nations. To that central issue, weapons in space are peripheral except for the fact that, once deployed, they would multiply the risks that a sophisticated lump of wire and dynamite stumbling blindly around space might bump into something by accident.

There are reasons to hope that the talks will succeed, and reasons to wonder whether they have a chance. The delegation that will go to Geneva with Secretary of State George P. Shultz for his meeting with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko includes Reagan advisers who regard imposing limits on the use of satellite-killers as an act of stupidity or suicide, and arms control of any kind as a brand of catnip that takes the nation's mind off the importance of vigilance and big defense budgets. The hard line on arms control may have softened at the White House. The players who helped harden the line in the first place have not.

One reason for optimism is that Paul Nitze will be in Geneva with Shultz as his chief arms-control adviser. Nitze is no patsy, but he does believe in arms control—unlike many other Reagan advisers—and he has been in the business long enough to know a bargaining chip from a potato chip. Another is the change in attitude at the White House itself. Months ago the President himself declared that it was impossible to negotiate a treaty that would guarantee to keep satellite-killers out of space. By last Monday, at Reagan's instructions, they were part of the Geneva agenda along with his cherished "Star Wars," with some strings attached.

What happens in Geneva depends on what the President allows to happen and what the Kremlin wants to happen. Stripped of illusions that weapons in space will make it easier, not more difficult, to negotiate real reductions in nuclear missiles, the talks have a chance to succeed. Working under instructions that concentrate more on the future threat of space weapons than on the present threat of intercontinental missiles, negotiators might well talk one another out of any arms controls at all, including those that already exist. And that would mean the beginning of a prospect more terrifying, if possible, than the one that drove Reagan to "Star Wars" in the first place.●

SPECIAL EDUCATION AWARDS TO MASSACHUSETTS TEACHERS

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, on December 6, 1984, the Massachusetts Association for Retarded Citizens recognized 13 individuals and 2 organizations for the excellent work they have done on behalf of the goal of humane care for those with mental retardation.

I am very proud that one of those who received an award is Lucille Provazza of the town of Seekonk, which is in my congressional district. Mrs. Provazza is a special education teacher in the Seekonk public schools. It's particularly appropriate at this time to note the extremely high regard in which Mrs. Provazza is held by the families of the young people with whom she works. At a time when people are looking closely at various public expenditures, special education ought to be recognized as one of the most important and cost-effective public expenditures we make— there are few things which it is more important for this society to do than to provide to the mentally retarded the kind of loving and knowledgeable educational help which people like Lucille Provazza give.

I want to add my congratulations to Mrs. Provazza for her skill, her dedication, and her compassion. All of us are indebted to her for the great work she does with retarded children. I want to add also my congratulations to Superintendent Gallishaw of the Seekonk school system, and to the Seekonk School Committee, and other people in the Seekonk system who work together to provide educational services.

I was pleased in reading through the list of those who received citations from the Massachusetts Association of Retarded Citizens to see a number of other residents of the Fourth Congressional District. My congratulations and my admiration also go to them and to the other award winners for the compassion they show for the mentally retarded, and for skill with which they discharge the responsibility that all of us in society owe to people with retardation.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the list of those receiving citations be printed here.

The list follows:

Allen C. Crocker, M.D. of Natick, Director of the Developmental Evaluation Clinic, Children's Hospital Medical Center: His support of children with mental retardation in his medical practice, research, consulting, and writing teach others to see that retardation is not limiting but rather a challenge.

Gunnar Dybwad, J.D. of Wellesley, Professor Emeritus of Human Development, The Florence Heller Graduate School, Brandeis University: As a teacher, researcher, and writer and, above all, an untiring advocate, he has made major contributions to improving the quality of life for those with mental retardation in every country of this world.

Rosemary Dybwad, Ph.D. of Wellesley, Senior Researcher, The Florence Heller Graduate School, Brandeis University: Through her research and writing, and her love and inspiration, she brought the mentally retarded into the mainstream of life.

Frederic J. England, Jr., CPCU of Reading, President of the Independent Insurance Agents of America: Without his support of the Massachusetts Association for Retarded Citizens (MARC) organization, MARC could not continue to work to try to improve the quality of life for the 12,000 children and adults with mental retardation that our 24 local affiliates serve every day. Accepting for Mr. England will be Donald Lewis.

Thomas Feeley of Belmont, the National Association for Retarded Citizens Volunteer of the Year: Through the years, his interest, concern, and involvement with MARC's local affiliates, the Greater Boston ARC and the Charles River ARC, has set an example of service for all volunteers.

Project Welcome, a joint project of Wheelock College and Children's Hospital Medical Cener: Linda Gilkerson, Ph.D. of Arlington, Program Director and Elizabeth Brown, M.D. of Jamaica Plain, Medical Director. Their development of a research guide to programs and their service to community agencies in training, consultation and enrichment programs are major contributions to the success of early intervention in the lives of high risk children.

Richard Howard, J.D. of Ipswich, Supervising Attorney, Developmental Disabilities Law Center: By successfully advocating for disabled people and their families in the courts and the legislature, he has assured that special needs students and their families need not settle for minimally adequate special education services.

Mary Lou Maloney of Jamaica Plain, former executive director of the Massachusetts Association for Retarded Citizens: During her ten years with the Massachusetts Association for Retarded Citizens, her conscientious representation of the interests of the 176,000 children and adults with mental retardation in Massachusetts resulted in improved community-based care and significant gains for the mentally retarded who were neglected after the age of 22.

Christine McKenna of Chelmsford, reporter for the Lowell Sun: In reporting that mentally disabled people can often speak well for themselves she spread the message that, with help, people with retardation can lead independent lives and be contributing members of society.

The Honorable John Murphy, State Representative, from Peabody: He has served the Commonwealth by being a valuable force in shaping legislation with positive effects for those with retardation. Accepting for Representative Murphy will be Jonathan Blodgett.

Lucille Provazza of Seekonk, special education teacher in the Seekonk Public Schools: Life for her students has been enhanced because she has creatively and skillfully fostered successful and creative relationships between the school system and the family that make life a warm and positive experience for her special needs students.

Margaret Pyne, Association Dean, Graduate School of Education, Lesley College: A pioneer in the training of special needs teachers she challenges her students to follow her standards of quality and excellence, commitment, and concern in the classroom.

The Polaroid Foundation: Christopher C. Ingraham of Westwood, President of the Polaroid Foundation and the Vice President of Polaroid, Inc.: Believing one of the most effective weapons for the alleviation and prevention of society's problems, is private support, humanitarian concern, and community involvement, the Polaroid Foundation has made major contributions to create work opportunities and increased personal growth for mentally retarded persons.

Stephen R. Shestakofsky, J.D. of Arlington, Director of the Special Projects, Bay State Skills Corporation: In the design and implementation of the Massachusetts Supported Work initiative for training mentally retarded persons, over 325 mentally retarded Massachusetts citizens each year are provided transitional training and employment opportunities.

David Wizansky of Brookline, Director of the DARE Outreach Counseling and Education Program and advisor to the Mohawks and Squaws. The oldest self advocacy group for mentally and physically handicapped persons in the country celebrates its 25th anniversary this year. Speaking out and helping others is not only central to the Mohawks and Squaws' philosophy, but has guided David Wizansky's life of service to those with mental retardation.

The lives of all the recipients of the 1984 Distinguished Citizen Awards sensitively illustrate Kahlil Gibran's lines:

Don't walk in front of me
I may not follow
Don't walk in back of me
I may not lead
Just walk beside me
And be my friend.

Please join me in a toast to our awardees. Ladies and gentlemen: Congratulations.●

THE SUNSET ACT OF 1985

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, as we confront the difficult task of managing Federal spending and revenues, we in Congress are operating without a key tool that would bring significant order and rationality to our deliberations.

Along with Mr. GEPHARDT, I have introduced the Sunset Act of 1985 to provide a new mechanism that would require each spending program and tax expenditure to be systematically reviewed every 10 years. Trying to manage the Federal Government without such a periodic review is like boxing with one arm tied behind your back.

It is useful and necessary to annually debate funding levels for agencies and programs. But when do we discuss the underlying assumptions and goals of a program? When do we reevaluate decades old decisions about the need for and design of individual programs? Without such a review, how can we make thoughtful overall policy decisions apart from the press of short term fiscal constraints?

The Sunset Act of 1985 would provide just such a review mechanism. The legislation was cosponsored by 65 Members in the 98th Congress, and I believe it is more important now than ever before.

The legislation we have introduced:

Requires all Federal spending programs to be reviewed at least once every 10 years.

Terminates spending authority for those programs which have not been reviewed and reauthorized.

Exempts programs into which citizens have paid in expectation of later direct return, such as Social Security.

Requires all tax expenditures to undergo a similar review.

Provides for a coordinated review of spending and tax programs by general purpose.

Remarkably enough, more than half of all Federal spending is through programs that are permanently authorized. Surely it is appropriate to reexamine our work every 10 years in light of any possible changes in social or economic priorities.

I hope that each Member will join in cosponsoring this important legislation, which will enable the Congress to effectively manage and review Federal spending and tax expenditures.●

THE 1984 KING'S DAY REGATTA, JACKSONVILLE, FL

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, every year in Jacksonville, FL, on the third weekend in November, there is held the King's Day Regatta. This is a tradition brought to Jacksonville, from the pre-Revolutionary days when Florida was an English colony and a King's Day Regatta was held there in the St. Johns River in honor of the King and the mother country. In current years, the regatta is not only an outstanding event enjoyed by the people in that area, and from long distances, but it emphasizes the affection and friendship existing in these days between the United States and the United Kingdom. Therefore, it has an importance far beyond what an ordinary regatta might have.

The King's Day Regatta occurs in Jacksonville, FL, in the same broad expanse of the St. John's River which was used in the 18th century for this same purpose. On November 17, prior to the actual sailing event, the British Ambassador to the United States, Sir Oliver Wright, addressed a formal dinner audience in the Continental Club in Orange Park, a suburb of Jacksonville. There he made the following comments among others:

I am grateful to you all for inviting me to join you in this year's celebration of the Kings Day Regatta. I am particularly grateful to Congressman Bennett: without his persistence, without his silver tongue, I doubt whether I should be here today.

I am doubly glad I came. At least I think I am. Let's see what happens tomorrow first. I am glad because your Regatta commemorates the brief British presence in Florida.

That presence ended over 200 years ago. So the British connection cannot have been too bad if you continue to celebrate it with such continuity, devotion and panache, 200 years on.

Secondly, because I am a naval man myself: that is to say if you so regard someone who took the King's shilling in 1941 at the age of 20 as an Ordinary Seaman and was demobilised 4 years later in the exalted rank of Lieutenant RNVR.

I am surprised that Florida should wish to be reminded of the British naval connection. I seem to remember that Sir Francis Drake sacked St Augustine in 1586. And he set such an example that another sailor repeated this exploit in 1668. Let me hasten to assure you that my intentions this evening are entirely honourable and peaceful.

Despite these war-like beginnings the last 200 years have been an era of peace and friendship between our two countries. We celebrated last year the 200th anniversary of the Treaty of Paris. As Benjamin Franklin, one of the American negotiators of that Treaty, wrote to his British counterpart, "we have been fellow workers in the best work of all, the work of peace."

Next year we shall be celebrating the 200th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and the United Kingdom.

These 200 years have brought benefits to our nations and our people which are unique in the history of relations between sovereign states. As George III said to the newly arrived American Minister to the Court of St James's, "I was the last to consent to the separation, but the separation having been made, and having become inevitable, I have always said, as I say now, that I would be the first to meet the friendship of the United States as an independent power."

Looked at from my desk in the Nation's Capital, George III's words continue to ring true. Maybe he was not such a bad guy after all. His portrait hangs on the main staircase of the British Embassy in Washington. All my American guests have to pass it on their way upstairs. I see it and salute it every day. It reminds me that even great men may make mistakes. It also reminds me that mistakes, if you learn from them, can provide the foundation of great endeavours. Maybe he is due for rehabilitation.

I do not doubt that one of those great enterprises is the special relationship which exists between your country and mine. When I presented by Letters of Credence to President Reagan over two years ago, it was he not I who spoke of our special relationship. What is good enough for the President of the United States is good enough for me.

We share a common heritage, a common language, the common law and a common respect for liberty under the law. We have the nub, the central core of our relationship in that one word: liberty.

I was re-reading recently Alexis de Tocqueville's great work "Democracy in America." That percipient Frenchman, writing a century and a half ago, came to the conclusion that it was democracy which marked out American society from other societies. And he called the people who lived in that society: Anglo-Americans!

The special relationship is special because it spans so many areas. But at root I suspect that it is founded on rather simple things. We have always been able to learn from each other. And we continue to do so. We learnt the lesson of the War of Independence. The American Revolution did not put Britain out of the empire business altogether. We were still in business in Canada, for example. Indeed for a century it was rather the reverse. But we had learnt that the demand for liberty and independence eventually becomes overwhelming and the only thing which satisfies it is liberty and independence itself.

That is why since the Second World War more than 600 million people in nearly 50 nations of the old British Empire have come to independence. And they have come to independence without war but by mutual consent.

And we also have shared over the last century a common commitment to paying the price for defending and preserving liberty. Twice in this century the United States has had to intervene in order to correct the troubles of the Old World. Even though so many forbears of the people in this country came here in order to escape from the problems of the Old World, Americans nevertheless recognized in 1917 and 1941 the need to uphold common values, the knowledge that a tree cannot grow if cut off from its roots. Such was your devotion to liberty that you could not stand idly by and watch the lamps of liberty being extinguished one by one in Europe. Above all nations, Britain has reason to be grateful for that essential ingredient of our common heritage.

Since the Second World War this commitment to common values has found expression in the North Atlantic Alliance. It has been in existence for 35 years. During that time the Alliance has lost not a man, woman nor child nor a square inch of territory.

For the Alliance has been the success story of the century. It has deterred aggression. It has kept the peace. It has attracted new members. And it has provided such a profound sense of security that in a recent poll in Britain over 70% of the population said that they approved of NATO. Only motherhood would win more widespread support.

Perhaps NATO has been too successful. Perhaps we feel too secure. For from time to time one senses a distinct feeling of angst in the air. From time to time we have Trans-Atlantic rows, most recently over the Siberian gas pipeline. From time to time Europe seems disunited, whether over a Community matter like the British budget problem or Alliance issues, like the stationing of Cruise and Pershing missiles, or about burden sharing. This leads the pessimists or the sensation mongers to forecast the imminent collapse of the European Community or approaching twi-light for the Alliance. All this, as Mark Twain said of a report of his death, is greatly exaggerated.

I predict that both the European Community and the NATO Alliance have long lives ahead of them. The fact remains that we solved the pipeline issue by taking counsel together and agreeing on an Alliance policy for trade in defence-related high technology with the Eastern bloc. The British budget problem has been resolved and the European Community is on the march again.

The countries of Europe are also pulling their weight in the defence of NATO. The U.K. Itself is committed to a strong defence policy. We have met the NATO target of 3% annual growth in real terms in defence spending and intend to do so until 1985/86 when the British defence budget will be 23% greater in real terms than it was in 1978/79 when Margaret Thatcher became Prime Minister. Britain has an independent nuclear deterrent: that demonstates how seriously we take defence and our contribution to the Western Alliance. At present our submarine-based deterrent uses the Polaris system and it will be replaced in the 1990s by Trident which we are buying from the United States.

It will cost us about $12 billion and help both the U.S. trade deficit and employment rates.

Britain spends more on defence than any other European member of NATO, both in absolute terms and on a per capita basis. We work closely with the United States. The military relationship is at the very core of Anglo-American friendship and cooperation. This has been the cause since the second World War and it is a matter of priority for the British Government today. There are 100 American bases in Britain where more than 28,000 American servicemen are stationed. Despite what may occasionally be seen on television, where minority protest is given exaggerated exposure, American servicemen stationed in Britain are welcome there. That was the verdict of our last general election.

The recent debate in Congress has reminded us that the contribution made by the European partners to Western defence is often under-estimated or misunderstood in the United States, even by the well informed. The facts are that Europe provides 70% of the Alliance's fighting ships in the Eastern Atlantic. On the Central front; Europe provides 90% of the ground forces; 80% of the combat aircraft; 80% of the tanks, and 90% of the armoured divisions dedicated to defending the western front line, the U.S. front line, the front line of the free world.

Quite right too, you will say. And I agree.

The total number of Europeans under arms is 3 million. The United States has 2 million under arms. This looks like pretty good burden-sharing to me. I hope we can agree on that too.

So the final thought I would leave with you is this. The Anglo-American relationship is sound, for it is based on common values. It has endured for 200 years and will, I am sure, endure for at least another 200 years. But all good things need working at. Relationships must not be taken for granted. Friendships, if they are to last, must be kept in good repair. The price of liberty is eternal vigilance.

So in thanking you for your hospitality to me this evening, I pay tribute to what I believe is your intention: to keep the friendship between Britain and America in good repair. That intention I share. I am happy to be able to tell you that our friendship is in good repair and happy to discover in Florida that it is in such good hands.

The Ambassador participated in the events on the following day and was warmly received during his entire stay in the Jacksonville area, being interviewed by the newspapers and other media and joining in all of the activities in a splendid participation.

The following news account from the Florida Times-Union tells of the winners in the regatta, top spot going to Scott Loftfield with his 33-foot Tartan 10.

[From the Florida Times-Union (Jacksonville), Nov. 19, 1984]

LOFTFIELD SURPRISES FIELD IN KING'S DAY

(By Lawrence Dennis)

It wasn't supposed to happen, but Scott Loftfield grabbed the brass ring in the seventh annual King's Day Regatta sailed on the St. Johns River yesterday.

Loftfield entered a Tartan 10, in this case a 33-footer named Oh Krap, in the race.

Oh Krap is a fairly frequent finisher in the money in Tartan class races, but a boat skippered by a captain with limited (2½ years) experience in racing isn't supposed to challenge for the first-in-fleet trophy or win the cup for first boat overall in PHRF (Performance Handicap Rating Fleet) class in the King's Day, which has become the premier cruiser-racing event between the Chesapeake and Fort Lauderdale.

But win it Loftfield did. He and wife Marta and crew crossed the finish line off the Florida Yacht Club a scant 30 seconds behind David Parrish on BigTime.

Seconds behind? Yes, but Parrish, who has sailed the Southern Ocean Racing Circuit (SORC) series on BigTime, is universally acknowledged as one of the finest sailors not only on the river but in North Florida, period.

And BigTime, an S-2 10.3, is a pretty classy racing boat, which means that it had to give some time to Oh Krap under the PHRF rating system. And that meant that though BigTime finished first in the 75-boat fleet, winning a trophy of its own for that accomplishment, Loftfield and crew corrected out best in the field to win the coveted Carl Z. Suddath trophy for first boat in on corrected time.

And strangely enough, Loftfield, a journeyman racer, literally beat the field because of bad luck in the early part of the 15-nautical-mile race.

"I was doing so bad at the first mark [after the race had gone about 3 miles] that I figured I didn't have anything to lose," Loftfield said.

After rounding the turn far behind (at an estimated 30th in fleet) the leaders, including Parrish on BigTime, Loftfield decided to take a gamble and go far inshore, while the bulk of the fleet stayed in midstream.

"I decided to take a flyer [a wild hare]," he said, "I took a chance, because nobody else was doing it."

The gamble paid off—Loftfield came out of nowhere to take over first place at the half-way mark, and though Oh Krap's fractional spinnaker rig couldn't stay ahead of BigTime and its mast-head chute on the final downwind leg, a pair of trophies was assured.●

GILMAN INTRODUCES FAST TRACK SURTAX LEGISLATION

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, once again I am reintroducing legislation designed to assist our Nation's vegetable growers. In the last Congress, I fashioned this measure with the assistance of growers from our northern tier region; since that time, the bill has gained the support of many local organizations as well as the endorsement of the National Onion Association. Quite simply, the bill continues to allow imported vegetables to enter this country; however, if they enter in such volume and with depressed prices so as to injure the domestic farmer, a surtax will be imposed on the offending commodity.

Importation of certain vegetable commodities into American markets during periods of heavy volume of U.S. production results in economic injury to our domestic producers through reduced produce prices. The declared value of a shipment at the point of entry into the United States often is not accurate. It is, therefore, necessary to provide a temporary surtax on commodities from time to time when increased volume of imports is presumed to have resulted in decreased domestic market prices. My legislation requires the Agriculture Department to monitor certain affected commodities to determine from volume and benchmark prices the extent of economic impact on our domestic growers. Should injury be determined for a specified commodity, a surtax system can be put into place, and the surtax would be collected by customs officials at the border.

The commodities this legislation proposes to monitor include: cabbages, carrots, celery, lettuce, red and yellow storage onions, potatoes, and radishes.

For purposes of determining the surtax, a "benchmark price" for each vegetable category will be determined, and would be computed for each month within the applicable marketing season (85 percent of the average monthly market price for domestic and imported articles for the same month during the 36-month period immediately preceding the month for which the computation is made). If the Secretary of Agriculture determines that the benchmark price is abnormally high or low due to harvest variations, then a computation can be made that equals 90 percent of the average monthly market price for that category for the same month during the 60-month period immediately preceding the month for which the computation is made.

In determining the market price of imported commodities under this bill, the sales price of imported articles at the three terminal markets having the heaviest volume of imports of the article being monitored would be considered.

My legislation allows the Secretary, upon petition, to add any classification of fresh vegetables, provided that the Secretary concludes that economic injury is being caused or threatened to the U.S. producers of that commodity.

During the harvesting season, the listed commodities would be monitored weekly, but if determined that the average market price paid does not equal 90 percent of the average price for that category for that week in the immediately preceding 3 years, then the Secretary can designate that vegetable as depressed, and monitoring continues on a daily basis for the prices paid for articles in that category as well as monitoring on a weekly basis the volume of imported articles in that category that are sold in terminal markets. If the average market price is below the benchmark price for that category, and if the volume exceeds by 5 percent the volume of the same imported article sold in a terminal market during the equivalent week 5 years ago, the surtax is established.

The weekly monitored terminal market price, when found to be below the benchmark price, will be subtracted from the benchmark price, and this difference will be added to the previous week's average price difference, if any, that is below, the benchmark price in order to determine the subsequent week's surtax amount.

After a surtax has been implemented, and the average weekly monitored price is found to be above the benchmark price, the previous week's surtax will be decreased by the amount of this difference in order to calculate the surtax for the following week.

The surtax for that vegetable commodity would be in effect for 180 days, and could be extended by the Secretary for another 90 days if it is determined that conditions are still the same.

There will be weeks, Mr. Speaker, when there will be no surtax. During other weeks, a surtax will be in place. The importing country will be notified as soon as findings are made by the Department of Agriculture, and the surtax will be collected at the border.

The problem of imports undercutting American prices affects almost every industry. The vegetable industry is not immune, and has been suffering severely. American producers of fresh vegetables receive no subsidies whatever from our Government, while many of our trading partners subsidize their growers nearly every step of the way. Trying to find American grown carrots in the Northeast is extremely difficult. I am informed that New York State only has a very few carrot producers left, and other States are losing family farms year after year.

I believe that this proposed agricultural surtax system, modeled after an existing system of one of our trading partners, is a fair method of ensuring that imported vegetables and potatoes do not further erode our agricultural economy. The American farmer is among out Nation's most vulnerable entrepreneurs, continually confronted with the hazards of droughts, floods, pestilence, surplus crops, and so forth. Unsubsidized, it takes our farmers years to recoup their losses from any natural disaster. Their plight is made worse by the onslaught of imported commodities that undercut their prices. This surtax system will provide needed relief, and will be utilized by the Department of Agriculture only when needed.

Mr. Speaker, I request that at this point in the RECORD a copy of my proposed legislation be printed in full for the review of my colleagues. I am requesting prompt hearings and ask my colleagues for their support. Together, by adopting this proposal, we can secure relief for the American vegetable and potato farmer.

H.R. 110

A bill to provide equitable treatment for certain fresh vegetables produced in the United States

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Fresh Vegetable and Potato Trade Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. As used in this Act:

(1) The term "article" means a specific vegetable category commodity entered into trade in a terminal market.

(2) The term "benchmark price" means, with respect to articles in a vegetable category, a price, computed for each month within the applicable marketing season, that equals—

(A) 85 per centum of the average monthly market price for domestic and imported articles in that category for the same month during the thirty-six-month period immediately preceding the month for which such computation is made; or

(B) if the Secretary considers that the benchmark price computed under subparagraph (A) is abnormally high or low because of harvest variations, 90 per centum of the average monthly market price for domestic and imported articles in that category for the same month during the sixty-month period immediately preceding the month for which such computation is made.

(3) The term "imported articles" means articles that have been entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, within the customs territory of the United States.

(4) The term "market price" means the sale price at which imported articles in a vegetable category are bought and sold in the course of trade at the three terminal markets having the heaviest volume of imports of such articles. The market price shall be based on such quantity of measure as the Secretary deems appropriate for purposes of carrying out this Act.

(5) The term "marketing season" means the marketing season in the United States for vegetables, that are produced in the United States, of a kind like those in a vegetable category, as determined by the Secretary.

(6) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Agriculture.

(7) The term "terminal market" means a marketing area in the United States at which major shipments of imported articles in a vegetable category are introduced into domestic commerce.

(8) The term "vegetable category" means each of the following classifications, identified by reference to the appropriate item numbers of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202), of vegetables, if fresh:

(A) Cabbages provided for in item 135.30.

(B) Carrots provided for in items 135.41 and 135.42.

(C) Celery provided for in items 135.60 and 135.61.

(D) Lettuce provided for in item 136.60 and 136.61.

(E) Red onions and yellow onions, of the type produced for storage holdings, provided for in item 136.93.

(F) Potatoes provided for in items 137.25, 137.26, 137.28, and 137.29.

(G) Radishes provided for in item 137.40.

The Secretary, for the purposes of this Act, may add for the duration of a marketing season any classification of fresh vegetable provided for in such Schedules as a vegetable category if a United States producer of vegetables of that kind petitions the Secretary for such addition and the Secretary concludes that economic injury is being caused or threatened to United States producers of articles in that category after applying the criteria in section 3(a) and (b)(2).

SEC. 3. (a) During each week of the marketing season, the Secretary shall monitor the market prices paid for articles in each vegetable category. If the Secretary finds, on the basis of such monitoring, that the average market price paid for articles in any vegetable category during a week does not equal 90 per centum of the average price for such category for such week in the immediately preceding three years, the Secretary shall, within five working days, publish notice thereof in the Federal Register designating that vegetable category as a depressed vegetable category.

(b) The Secretary shall, with respect to articles in each vegetable category designated as a depressed vegetable category under subsection (a)—

(1) monitor on a daily basis the market prices paid for articles in such category; and

(2) monitor on a weekly basis the volume of imported articles in such category that is sold in commerce at terminal markets.

(c) If the Secretary determines, on the basis of the monitoring required under subsection (b) regarding a vegetable category that is depressed, that—

(1) the average market price for articles in that category for any week in the marketing season was below the benchmark price for such category; and the imported articles in that vegetable category shall be presumed to be causing, or threatening to cause, economic injury to United States producers of like vegetables.

(2) the volume of imported articles in that category that was sold in commerce at terminal markets during such week exceeds by 5 per centum or more the volume of imported articles in that category sold at terminal markets during the equivalent seven-day period in calendar year 1978;

SEC. 4. (a)(1) Within two working days after making a determination under section 3(c) regarding imported articles in a vegetable category, the Secretary, by publication of notice thereof in the Federal Register, shall (A) issue notice of such determination, and (B) establish a surtax period for such category which shall be the one hundred and eighty-day period commencing on the next Thursday which occurs not less than five days after the date on which such determination was made. The Secretary shall at the time of such publication notify the exporting countries of articles in such category of such establishment.

(2) The Secretary may extend a surtax period established under paragraph (1) by an additional ninety days if he determines that the conditions which led to the establishment of the initial one hundred and eighty-day surtax period are still in effect at the close of the initial period.

(b)(1) There is imposed on all articles in a vegetable category to which a determination under section 3(c) applies that are entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, in the customs territory of the United States during each week within the surtax period a surtax for that week, the amount of which shall be computed on a weekly basis in accordance with subsection (c) by the Secretary on the basis of the applicable market prices.

(2) A surtax imposed under this Act shall be treated for all purposes of the customs laws as a duty which is in addition to any other duty imposed on the entry or withdrawal from warehouse of articles in the vegetable category concerned.

(c)(1) For purposes of this section—

(A) The term "computation period" means the seven-day period that ends on a Wednesday in the two weeks before the week in which a surtax week begins.

(B) The term "surtax week" means each seven-day period, beginning on a Thursday, that is within a surtax period established under subsection (a).

(2) The surtax imposed under subsection (b) for each surtax week on imported articles within a vegetable category shall be determined on the basis of the relationship between the average daily market price paid during the applicable computation period for articles in such category, and the applicable benchmark price for such articles, as follows:

(A) If there is no difference between such market price and benchmark price—

(i) no surtax shall apply during the surtax week if no surtax is in effect for the immediately preceding surtax week; or

(ii) the surtax for the surtax week shall be the same as the surtax, if any, in effect for the immediately preceding surtax week.

(B) If such market price is below the benchmark price, the surtax for the surtax week shall be—

(i) an amount equal to the difference between such prices, if there is no surtax in effect for the immediately preceding surtax week, or

(ii) an amount equal to such difference plus the amount of any surtax in effect for the immediately preceding surtax week.

(C) If such market price exceeds such benchmark price—

(i) no surtax shall apply during the surtax week if no surtax is in effect for the immediately preceding surtax week, or

(ii) the surtax for the surtax week shall be the amount of the surtax in effect for the immediately preceding surtax week reduced by the amount of such excess (but not below zero).

(3) For purposes of determining under paragraph (2) the surtax to be imposed during the first surtax week in any surtax period, a surtax shall be determined under paragraph (2)(B) on the basis of the findings of the Secretary under section 3(c)(1) on the imported articles concerned and such surtax shall be treated as being in effect during the week before such first surtax week.

(d) The Secretary shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the surtax, or absence thereof, as determined under subsection (c) for each surtax week within the surtax period established for a vegetable category. The Secretary of the Treasury shall take such action as may be necessary or appropriate to levy and collect any such surtax so certified, including the requirement of additional bond to secure payment of a surtax.

SEC. 5. The Secretary and the Secretary of the Treasury shall each issue such regulations as may be necessary and appropriate to carry out this Act.●

TECHNOLOGY DEVELOPMENT CONFERENCE, BONN, GERMANY

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, at a recent conference in Bonn, Germany my colleague and chairman of the Committee on Science and Technology, the Honorable DON FUQUA, delivered remarks on the future conduct of science in the world that I would like to call to the attention of all of us. The ideas present an alternative approach to the development of "big science." This approach is one to which we in America have not been accustomed. The ideas are thoughtful and provocative, and I believe we would all benefit from giving them serious consideration. In part, Mr. FUQUA said the following:

While science and technology have helped us each meet our national objectives and goals, they have also played a role in bringing all nations of the globe closer in cooperation.

However, these international efforts have been, for the most part, isolated programs. We, as a community of industrial nations in the world, have not yet developed a pattern of using science and technology to move us beyond the realization of individual nation goals to the next level, that of global goals. Science and technology are tools of such potential and magnitude that, given their possibilities, we have barely begun to utilize them to achieve global well-being and prosperity.

We are a wonderfully diverse conglomerate of nations, and a group of several unique continents; ultimately, however, we are one planet upon which mankind must continue to survive. Although our different cultures and histories cause us to function in different ways, this individuality, this nationalism, must also become more compatible with our global goals. We must recognize that there can be both competition and cooperation among nations; there can be both diversity and solidarity. These are not mutually exclusive but rather, I believe, mutually beneficial.

I want to address specifically the place of science in that gobal perspective. In Jacob Bronowski's book, Science and Human Values, he says, "the world today is made, it is powered by science. . . ." I would expand on his declaration a bit. We so frequently hear and use the phrase "science and society." If we perceive science and society to mean that science has a "relationship to" or a "role in" our society, then we may be persuaded, in these times to budget imbalances and burdensome deficits, to believe that both national and international support of science is worthwhile and even important, but not absolutely essential.

If, however, in our contemporary context, science and society are understood to be interdependent, then science funding is appropriately fundamental to our national and international well-being. I firmly believe that the latter is the case.

Science is a human endeavor, always dependent upon human thought, curiosity, and dedication to know and understand more. Society is a community of people having common interests. Contemporary society has survived and prospered through its increasing utilization and integration of the new knowledge and understanding that science produces. It is the human endeavor of science put to work for the whole human society that has forwarded much of our civilization.

Although science has always been an international exercise among individual scientists, I believe the time has come for it also to become a routine international exercise among nations.

The internationally known biologist and author Lewis Thomas wrote recently in Foreign Affairs magazine, "I believe that international science is an indisputable good for the world community, something to be fostered and encouraged whenever possible. I know of no other transnational human profession . . . from which human beings can take so much intellectual pleasure and at the same time produce so much of immediate and practical value for the species."

I am extremely pleased that the agendas of the Versailles, Williamsburg, and London Summits testify to the growing affirmation of this understanding.

At the summit meeting agreement was also reached to plan nearly twenty cooperative science and technology projects, each worthy of attention and effort.

I am concerned, however, that there is a much larger perspective that must be examined if collaboration in these areas is to become a successful, forward-moving effort for future continuation, rather than the isolated accomplishment of a scientific event or project.

It seems to me that in each major scientific discipline that lends itself to megaproject efforts, we need to look at the big picture for that discipline for perhaps the next 20–30 years. Then within that overall picture, specific projects and experiments will logically fit along that continuum of time.

At this point, a significant question must surely be, who is the collective "we" that will look at the big picture? Well, in identifying a long-term scenario for fusion as an example, the pronoun "we" would be personified by the European fusion community, Japan, the United States and possibly the Soviet Union.

They are the principals in fusion research today. As a group, they house most of the world's knowledge and expertise in fusion energy. Collectively, they ought to be able to map the general direction of the road for the next few decades and then delineate where specific markers and way stations would need to be set up in order to progress along the specified path.

This approach would serve two important purposes. First, it would allow us to understand the relationship of each experiment or project to the larger, more comprehensive discipline. And second, it would also help us to parcel out and balance the long-term responsibilities for the whole scientific accomplishment and even determine tentative geographical locations for various future projects.

This more comprehensive view would make us mindful of the presumption that any given tree in the forest represents the forest in totality, and any one experiment the larger scientific discipline.

But we cannot hope for this kind of comprehensive outlook for each science discipline to be successful if we do not go one significant step further. As we attempt to parcel out and balance the long-term responsibilities for each major discipline of science, we will have to do so on the much larger arena of all the science disciplines viewed collectively.

In this largest scientific context, each nation will be able to see the benefits for itself in the more comprehensive scheme. While one of us will perhaps have to relinquish some national advantage to join the "international pack" in fusion research where a different lead nation could be identified, we would be able to view this as a trade-off for a place we might hold in space research or high energy physics.

I believe that if we do not use this more universal approach, it will be philosophically simple for nations to agree to give up national control and advantage in a given area but in practicality it will be difficult to get the cooperation and funding commitments necessary. It seems to me that this can only be accomplished if we agree to set up something in the nature of an international body or parliament of science.

In such a forum we would be able to view the trees or experiments as part of the forest of a specific science discipline but even more importantly, we could see beyond each forest to the larger geography of science. Ultimately, it can only be from this geography that we can agree to be dedicated caretakers of all the forests and their individual trees and in return receive an appropriate share of the harvest.

Our knowledge and research are now so sophisticated that in order to probe further, in order to learn more, in order to reach higher, we must use ever more complicated and costly tools and technology. Although we may not be reaching limits in the knowledge we can accrue, we are, in many cases, reaching limits for some scientific projects that any one nation can unilaterally fund and maintain.

In addition to the task of mapping out an overall plan and direction for advancing a particular scientific discipline in which we can consider major cooperation, I believe the global community of participants also needs to address the issue of coherent strategies for carrying out all "big science".

As we look toward the prospect of routine scientific partnership, we must be meticulous in our objectives and policies because goodwill and diplomacy can quickly disintegrate in an environment of misunderstanding and misinterpretation.

In general, global collaboration in "big science" projects will mean, for each participating nation, the necessity of giving up a degree of nationalism in exchange for a step gained toward our international goals. This is not always simple for a nation and perhaps it is more difficult for the United States given the position of both independence and isolation in our history and culture.

America's role in cooperative science endeavors must be one in which we learn to be a more equal partner. We cannot plan to paying a disproportionate share of the costs in any venture in exchange for the prevailing voice.

In addition, our budget process is set up on the basis of an annual appropriation which has created conflicts for us in making commitments to multiyear projects. In this situation we always run the risk that restricted funds will force us to choose either reneging on an international commitment or diminishing our domestic program in order to meet the continuing international commitment. Neither of these is a satisfactory choice for us as participants or for the long-term harmony and security of an international project.

In our effort to seek major international science collaboration on a continuing basis, we as a nation must simultaneously tackle this funding issue at home. I believe it is time for us to integrate the philosophy of big science collaboration with the financial and functional practicalities of making them work.

To be a reliable partner, which America has not always been, we all have to accept the responsibility that the stability of any science megaproject will be directly dependent upon the stable funding commitment of its participants.

The proposals that I have put forth here for "big science" collaboration might easily be interpreted as a general suggestion that makes sound philosophical sense today, and may, at some point, have practical bearing on a future way to do things. I do not mean for this to be the case.

As you know, America is in the initial planning stages of a space station in which we have already invited major international collaboration. We are also commencing discussions and design of a Superconducting Super Collider (SSC). As our plans are more clearly defined, the SSC may very well become a prime candidate for just such "big science" collaboration. This early stage of planning is perhaps the opportune moment for examining SSC as a possibility.

In my view, the cost and complexity of these scientific projects which drain our human and financial resources dictate a future where cooperation will become a routine exercise for the advancement of scientific research, rather than the exception that it is now.

And I believe we can only do this successfully if this collaboration is not only within the comprehensive circle of each science field but, beyond that, to a further cooperation that sees the largest science disciplines as pieces in the bigger scheme that addresses the future tasks of science within the global forum I have proposed.

At this very time, the Science Committee is undertaking a review of our national science policy. The study will span the two years of the new Congress. As a nation, we have not taken a comprehensive look at these policies for about 40 years. Our last major study was undertaken shortly after World War II. Times, conditions and priorities have inevitably changed and we are perhaps overdue for this review. It will be, as far as basic principles are concerned, a study which will address the next 40 years.

As the Science Committee's Task Force begins this study in January, I will suggest to the other Members that they consider how to address the issue of developing an international consensus in defining the scope of the several scientific disciplines in which there will be expanding activity over the next few decades within the concept of an international forum.

These next 40 years, that our study will attempt to examine, offer a vastly different perspective of the world and America's place in it. Although, as a nation, we in America have been abundantly endowed with a rich variety of resources, there is no nation that possesses all that it needs. In addition, practically everything short of sunlight on this Earth is either limited in quantity or depletable by misuse. As we come to increasingly understand this reality, we are more aware that our individual existence depends, more than ever, on the survival of the earth's collective population. This necessarily leads to cooperation.

As I have said, I do not believe that the concepts of competition and cooperation are mutually exclusive, but rather on a more expensive level, mutually beneficial. I believe that the tension between competition and cooperation in the international community is not a negative force because it drives each nation to find its own avenue of economic success while accepting the increasing reality of security and well-being through cooperation.

Competition can bring us excellence, innovation, and diversity. It enhances our desire and our determination to improve. As for cooperation, it will not always be out of love for our fellow man that we choose to cooperate, but rather out of the practical knowledge that it is crucial to the survival of each of us. Our world is too small, too tight and too volatile to have it any other way.

I have been honored by your invitation to speak here today and hope that these thoughts will provoke future discussions and perhaps serve as stepping-stones to an expanded era not only in German-American relations but in global relations.●

H.R. 3, BALANCED BUDGET STATUTORY APPROACH

HON. JAMES R. JONES

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would require the President to submit and Congress to consider balanced Federal budgets. The bill I introduce today is, for all intents and purposes, identical to H.R. 6300, a measure which I introduced last Congress and which was overwhelmingly passed by the House of Representatives on October 2, 1984.

As the 99th Congress begins, we must all live up to our responsibility to the American people. It is vitally important that we begin this year's budget process by looking at the hard numbers and choices we face to reduce and eliminate the huge budget deficits which threaten our economic future.

The bill I introduce today is an important step in this process. It would apply equally to the President and the Congress. It would start immediately, not sometime in the distant future.

While there is no substitute for political courage, we can make our job easier by passing this bill. I urge your support for this key legislation.●

HYDROELECTRIC RELICENSING: AN ISSUE OF FAIRNESS AND EQUITY

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a bill, H.R. 44, that is of critical importance to millions of electricity consumers—the relicensing of hydroelectric projects across the Nation.

The bill introduced today is identical to one I introduced in the 98th Congress, H.R. 4402, which had 120 cosponsors when that Congress adjourned. It was designed to provide fair and equitable treatment of the majority of this Nation's electric consumers during the relicensing of hydroelectric projects.

Since the Federal Power Act was enacted in 1920, investor-owned utilities have undertaken the financial and technological risks to develop hydroelectric facilities which provide low-cost, fuel-free power for their customers. During the past 60 years, these customers have paid for the development and operation of these facilities through their electric rates.

Today, however, there is a movement by a privileged few to take over, without paying just compensation, hydroelectric projects which now benefit many. In just the next 10 years, licenses of 178 hydroelectric projects operated by investor-owned utilities come up for renewal. Some of these licenses, which were originally issued for a maximum of 50 years, are now being contested by municipalities claiming a relicensing preference exists in the act. Because of the tremendous economic benefits of these existing projects, many more challenges can be expected. Giving municipal systems a preference to take away hydropower facilities developed and paid for by the majority of this Nation's electricity consumers is unfair, inequitable, and wrong.

Unless the 99th Congress acts to clarify that a municipal preference does not apply to relicensing, millions of electricity consumers will be penalized only to benefit a select few.

This legislation calls for any existing licensee to receive a new license unless the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission determines, when judged against criteria in the law and competing applications, that the existing licensee's project was not the one best adapted to utilize this important natural resource. Additionally, this bill would require just compensation in exchange for the physical assets and their associated value if a new license were issued to a successful competitor.

The bill would not change the municipal preference which exists during initial licensing procedures. It would, however, protect existing licensees and millions of consumers from unjustifiable losses of hydroproject assets and benefits at the time of relicensing existing facilities.

Legislation is needed to resolve FERC's conflicting interpretations of the Federal Power Act which have created great uncertainty about whether municipal preference applies to the relicensing of an existing project. While FERC's latest interpretation finds that a municipal preference does not apply against existing licensees at relicensing, public power interests are appealing that decision in the courts. Regardless of the ultimate court decision, this is an important public policy issue which Congress must resolve.

The strong backing of the last Congress for the Electric Consumers Protection Act will undoubtedly carry over to the 99th Congress. Active support from State regulatory commissions, State legislators, county governments, business associations, labor organizations, and consumers is growing. Moreover, editorial support for this legislation continues to grow. Printed below are an editorial froim the New York Times, a resolution passed by the National Association of Counties, and excerpts from a statement of the National Conference of State Legislatures.

This issue must be addressed soon. The interests of consumers who have paid for the development and operation of these facilities must be protected. The low-cost benefits of our Nation's most valuable renewable energy source should be shared as widely as possible, not concentrated in a small segment of the country's population.

HYDROELECTRIC RESOLUTION—PASSED BY THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF COUNTIES (NACO), JULY 10, 1984

Whereas, investor-owned electric utilities serve 72 million electric customers in the United States—almost 80 percent of all electric customers in the nation; and

Whereas, those customers and their families represent over 176 million people and 8 million industrial, commercial and agricultural customers; and

Whereas, over the last 80 years, a number of those utilities have developed and paid for hydroelectric plants to supply economical, clean, renewable energy to their customers; and

Whereas, hydroelectric generation has no associated fuel costs, unlike thermal fuels; and

Whereas, hydroelectric provides substantial savings to utility customers in fuel costs; and

Whereas, a number of the licenses issued by the Federal Power Commission—now the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC)—in the 1920's and 1930's to the utilities to build and operate those hydroelectric projects are now expiring; and

Whereas, a number of city-run utilities have filed with the FERC to take over the expiring licenses for those projects, and they have claimed a "preference" over millions of customers of the present owners and operators; and

Whereas, the continued ownership, and operation of these hydroelectric projects by the present license-holders is generally in the public interest and to the social and economic well-being of the customers presently served by the projects; and

Whereas, National Association of Counties (NACo) represents 1,900 member counties out of 3,106 nationwide in (number of states);

Be it further resolved, That NACo hereby supports H.R. 4402 "Electric Consumers Protection Act of 1983" or similar legislation that protects utility customers by amending the Federal Power Act to provide that any existing licensee shall receive a new license for its hydroelectric projects unless the existing licensee's past and future operation of the project would not be in the public interest as determined by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission under the standards presently in the Act or if there is a competing license application which most closely meet the public interest as determined by the standard of the Act.

Be it further resolved, That copies of this Resolution be provided to Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and appropriate members of the U.S. Congress.

NCSL recognizes that due to the larger number of consumers served by investor-owned companies which produce hydroelectric power, a public-power preference in relicensing would concentrate the benefits of hydroelectric power among the relatively fewer customers of public power, rather than serving the public interest by spreading these benefits over the much larger number of consumers served by investor-owned utilities. Currently, there are nine competitive relicensing cases pending before FERC. The benefits of these projects, and the Merwin project that is now in the courts, are now spread among 8.4 million customers of the existing investor-owned utility licensees while the public power entities seeking ownership serve only 836,000 customers who have paid none of the costs associated with construction, operation, and maintenance during the original license term.

NCSL recognizes that the application of preference at relicensing will cause higher bills for investor-owned utility customers to cover expensive fossil fuels or replacement power purchases to make up for the lost generation. In some cases, power plant construction may be necessary earlier than planned to compensate for the lost generation. NCSL also recognizes that ownership transfers to state and municipal utilities could result in significant reduction in taxes paid to state and local governments by investor-owned utilities.

Therefore, NCSL urges the Congress to make clear that the only basis that would justify the transfer of a license at the time of relicensing and the resulting disruptions and inequities is that a competitor's plan is better adapted to developing the resource in the public interest than the existing licensee's.

Further, NCSL urges Congress to provide a legislative clarification which would eliminate future reversals in decisions regarding "preference" in relicensing. Accordingly, NCSL urges Congress to amend the Federal Power Act to clarify that preference does not apply at the time of relicensing. FERC should award a new license to the entity which offers, through the relicensing application process, the plan which best meets the public interest standards in the Act. Public interest considerations must include, among other factors, impacts on consumers, recreational benefits, environmental values, water-power development plans, and preservation of public ownership of the basic resource.

Further, NCSL believes that in the case of competition for a new license, factors that must be considered by FERC, among others, include the competing plan's compatibility with comprehensive state river-basin plans and compliance with the requirements of state law with respect to the use of bed and banks of navigable waters and to the appropriation, diversion, and use of water for power purposes. In this regard, NCSL emphasizes the importance of provisions in the present law and regulations requiring preapplication consultation with state and local governments and providing the opportunity for state and local agencies of government to intervene in licensing proceedings to present evidence concerning these matters.

POWER TO THE PEOPLE, PRIVATELY

The Mokelumne River hydro complex near Lake Tahoe provides low-cost power to 3.5 million customers of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company. Now the city of Santa Clara is asking the Federal Government to transfer all the hydropower to its 40,000 municipal electric co-op customers.

Common sense suggests that the extremely cheap power from this Federal project, worth $45 million a year, should be shared as widely as possible. But a legal loophole gives Santa Clara an inside track to the bonanza. In fact, unless the law is changed, 189 Federal hydropower systems will be vulnerable to takeovers by small, publicly owned utilities in the next ten years.

Private utilities operate some 300 Federal hydropower dams under 50-year licenses. These regulated utilities must pass on the benefits of low-cost power to consumers. Many of the dams were built in the 30's and 40's and the licenses are starting to come up for renewal. Under an ambiguously worded provision of a 1920 law, publicly owned utilities seem to have preferential rights to the power. Not surprisingly, private licensees and representatives of their millions of customers are pressing Congress to amend the law.

The ideal reform—one desired by neither private utilities that have the hydropower now nor the municipal co-ops that hope to get it—would auction off expired licenses to the highest bidder. That way, all Americans would share the benefits of hydropower, which typically costs one-tenth as much as electricity generated from oil.

But a free market solution holds little appeal to Congress. No organized interest would benefit very much. The next-best approach is more politically practical: Spread the cheap hydropower as widely as possible. Since current private licensees serve many times more people than the municipal co-ops angling to replace them, they should be given preference in license renewal.

With the support of the Reagan Administration, a bill to do just that has been introduced in the House by Richard Shelby of Alabama and 100 cosponsors. More power to them.●

CANKER RELIEF FOR THE FLORIDA CITRUS INDUSTRY

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today Congressman IRELAND and I are introducing legislation which amends the Small Business Act to provide a much-needed Federal loan program to members of the Florida citrus industry who have suffered severe economic loss due to—the recent discovery and Government's attempted eradication of—citrus canker.

Last September, citrus canker was discovered in one of Florida's largest retail nurseries. Since that time, eight additional nurseries in Florida have been found to be infected by this devastating disease. Canker, a highly contagious bacteria which attacks the leaves, twigs, and fruit of most citrus stock, can cause defoliation, fruit drop, and general decline of both nursery stock and mature producing trees.

To date, the only method known to control and eradicate the spread of the disease is by burning the infected plants. Unfortunately, this method is hampered by the fact that canker can be easily spread by infected nursery stock or budwood, wind, rain, or by the slightest contact with insects, animals, people, or equipment.

Upon initial confirmation of the disease, the USDA embargoed the shipment of all Florida citrus fruit. By November, these restrictions were eased; however, great financial hardship was experienced by the entire Florida citrus industry during this 2-month period.

The State of Florida and the USDA's Federal Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service [APHIS] have worked together in developing and implementing a strategy to limit further infestation of the disease and to eradicate canker where it has already been found.

Currently, this strategy, or "Action Plan," calls for the complete destruction of all nurseries wherever canker is discovered. It also calls for the destruction of all trees that were purchased from these nurseries and have been planted in groves as a reset. Regardless of whether or not these new trees have been found to have canker, they too must be destroyed. However, if canker is found in a "reset," all trees within 125 feet of the reset must be destroyed.

In addition, tough sanctions have been imposed to prevent the spread of the disease within the State of Florida and to other citrus-producing regions of the country. One such sanction requires that all interstate shipments must be from certified canker free zone areas and that fruit from these areas must be dipped in a chlorine solution and packaged at a registered packing house. While these sanctions are needed to prevent the further spread of canker, many small roadside sellers are on the verge of bankruptcy because they cannot comply with the costly regulations for dipping and labeling.

The legislation which my colleague and I are introducing today is designed to help the small growers, nurserymen, packers, and sellers who have been adversely impacted by Government actions to control citrus canker.

Our legislation is similar to programs developed by SBA in response to economic injury resulting from other Government programs. It amends the Small Business Act to provide directed Federal loans and federally guaranteed loans to members of the Florida citrus industry who have been adversely impacted by canker and the actions taken to eradicate this disease. These loans are not contingent upon a borrower's ability to obtain commercial credit, but they do require that the ability of the borrower to repay the loan be considered as part of the loan review process.

In addition, the bill establishes the maximum term of the loan at 7 years. The citrus industry is different from most other agricultural industries in that a newly planted citrus tree often does not bear fruit for 5 or more years. Additionally, those nurseries or groves found to be infected by canker will be unable to replant for 2 or more years in order to fully ensure that all canker bacteria has been destroyed. Clearly, current programs simply do not provide for an adequate time in which citrus growers can realistically operate.

Under our legislation, the maximum loan is limited to $750,000. Again, this limit has been designed to meet the unique long-term nature of the investment and the recovery period for the citrus industry.

Mr. Speaker, after reviewing all loan programs currently available, I believe neither the Farmers Home Administration nor the SBA disaster loan programs meet the specific and unique needs of the Florida citrus industry.

Without a doubt, the Florida citrus industry has suffered devastating economic set-backs over the past several years. While the recent discovery of citrus canker has economically damaged the Florida citrus industry, it has not dampened the spirits of its members. This multibillion dollar industry is a vital thread in the State's economy as well as a way of life for many people.

This much-needed legislation tailors existing SBA loan programs to provide an opportunity for the growers, nurserymen, packers and sellers to get back in business. By providing them with a fair and equitable solution, I believe the State of Florida will continue to lead the way in citrus production.●

HOW TO STOP DRUNK DRIVING

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, on October 19, 1984, I chaired a hearing at Marin County's Civic Center in California entitled "How To Stop Drunk Driving." In the course of 3 hours we heard the testimony of a dozen witnesses. The purpose of this summary is to highlight the important points raised by the witnesses and to offer my conclusions regarding appropriate measures to curb this menace on our highways.

Joe Wilner, the chairman of the Marin County Alcohol Advisory Board, began by emphasizing the positions of alcohol and driving, respectively, in our culture. Alcohol, though clearly a drug, has broad social and commercial sanction as a recreational beverage and personal relaxant. The automobile is a symbol of independence, prosperity, and mobility in America; it is also in many cases an indispensable adjunct to employment. To deter drinking and driving, Wilner believes drivers must be convinced that there is a high probability of being stopped. He recommends the use of roadside sobriety checks.

Andrew M. Mecca, Dr. P.H., Marin County Chief of Alcohol and Drug Services, presented an encyclopedic overview of the topic. He pointed out that 25,000 Americans die yearly in alcohol-related highway accidents. A disproportionate number of incidents involve teenagers. Other nations utilize sobriety checkpoints or impose much stiffer penalties on offenders. Mecca recommended checkpoints as the most effective initial deterrent. He also pressed for a 1-year treatment/education program for first offenders, shown to have been effective in substantially reducing further violations. Mecca recommended financing through additional user taxes on alcohol.

California Highway Patrol Commissioner, J.M. (Maury) Hannigan, pointed out that California's law enforcement agencies make more than 25 percent of the drunk driving arrests nationwide, and are dependent upon Federal funding in doing so. He views the problem as not simply one for law enforcement, but a major need for increased public awareness. He emphasized the enormous burden prosecutions place on the judicial system. He mentioned a pilot program of sobriety checkpoints being initiated by the patrol if approved by the California attorney general. He called for a coordinated educational campaign, both in the schools and in the print and electronic media.

Judge William H. Stephens presides over the county's municipal court, where drunk driving cases are prosecuted. He emphasized that drunk driving offenders come from all socioeconomic strata, and that the law in this area is aimed at preventing rather than punishing after injury occurs. Since neither drinking nor driving is a prohibited activity, he felt society was attempting to introduce a "guage" into people's minds about how much they can drink without impairing their driving. Alluding to burdens on law enforcement and the judicial system, he urged a separate civil system for drunk drivers which would act on first offense and include tough penalties, including stiffer license suspension.

County District Attorney Jerry Herman discussed the record of his office's prosecutions under the new State drunk driving law which was effective January 1982. The key element of the tougher law is an absolute prohibition on driving with a blood alcohol concentration above 0.1 percent, which he has found the juries willing to respect. Because of limited jail facilities he questions first-offense confinement, urging instead consideration of work programs, probation, and education and treatment. He mentioned the growth in use of a "designated driver" in situations where a group of people drink at a social function.

James "Silky" Sullivan has founded a network called Bartenders Against Drunk Driving, for people who have been "BADD" by having too much to drink at a tavern. The concept is to require participating tavern operators to take away the car keys of an intoxicated patron, and provide him instead a voucher for a cab ride home. Financing has been seeded both by bar operators and public contributions. Persons provided transportation by "cab tab" will be requested to contribute as well. Sullivan expressed opposition to on-site blood-alcohol testers.

Vic Biondi represented the California Broadcasters Association as their executive director. He mentioned his access to more than 400 radio and TV stations in California. He believes that a key element in preventing drunk driving is a major increase in the amount of information disseminated to the public about the serious consequences of drinking and driving. His association has provided such information to members at major holidays for some time, and has a new high-impact announcement in production for distribution during the upcoming holidays.

Joy Phoenix helped organize and is president of the local Mothers Against Drunk Driving Chapter. She emphasized how few drinks it takes to impair driving abilities, and the parental role in teaching responsibility in alcohol use. Parents and teachers need to work together on this. She urged increased fines for violators. Noting the difficulty of enforcing license suspensions, she urged consideration of vehicle impoundment, tried in Alaska. She demonstrated her group's support for people victimized by drunk driving. Ms. Phoenix shared with us ads in young people's magazines which push alcohol use.

Julia George da Silva spoke for her high school's Students Against Drunk Driving group [SADD]. She described experiments with a hotline and the designated driver concept, as well as student discussions and educational symposia. She exhibited a formal agreement between parent and teenage child. By its terms, a teenager agrees to call his or her parent for advice or a ride at any hour if they or their driver have had too much to drink. The parent agrees to provide the needed transportation, refrain from criticism and questions until a later time, and to seek only safe sober transportation for him/herself when they are in the same situation.

Several members of the audience also addressed us, including a father whose son was recently injured in an alcohol-related traffic accident. This reminded me of the pain and outrage I felt last spring when three teenagers in my district were killed by a drunk driver who crossed into their lane and collided head-on with their car. Though I have supported remedial legislation as a public official for 10 years, as a parent of teenagers I was then moved to introduce a bill to tie highway funding to stiffer penalties for drunk driving. I will continue to press for the enactment of such a measure.

This hearing served to emphasize that laws are not the only answer to this problem. We critically need a heightened public awareness of the tragedies caused by drunk driving. Starting in grammar school and continuing through prelicense DUI education, the seriousness of this issue must be consistently underscored. Parents who buy their teenagers a keg of beer for their party must realize that alcohol is a dangerous drug. The media must be enlisted, and all first-time offenders must be given a sobering understanding of the dangers they pose to others and the accountability we expect of them. Though I value individual liberty and privacy, I believe that we should not dismiss the use of sobriety checkpoints as a means of heightening public appreciation of the gravity of the situation.

Repeat offenders must be gotten off the road. License suspensions must be made effective, and records of juvenile violations should not be lost. Driving, necessary as it sometimes seems in our society, remains a privilege available only to those who exercise it responsibly. Drinking is a consumer pleasure supported by a strong commercial interest; alcohol should be taxed to the full extent necessary and useful to at least pay for those educational programs which are so lacking. I invite my colleagues to join with me in the search for solutions to this plague, which kills an average of 55 constituents for each of us, and injures and destroys family lives for several times that many, each year. As we enter the new legislative year, let us explore solutions to this serious problem.●

TAX DEDUCTIONS FOR HOME CARE AND ADULT DAY CARE OF ALZHEIMER VICTIMS

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, during the 98th Congress this body finally became aware of the physical, financial, and emotional toll of Alzheimer's disease on its victims and their caregiving families. Between 3 and 4 million older Americans are afflicted with this illness, the fourth leading cause of death. It is estimated that over 5 percent of those over 60 have Alzheimer's disease and 20 percent of those over 80. Hundreds of thousands in their forties and fifties are victims as well.

Senile dementia of the Alzheimer's type is a degenerative brain disorder which steadily and relentlessly impoverishes its victims of memory, personality, and finally all bodily functions over a period of from 3 to 20 years. It is not hard to imagine the anguish—and burden—such an affliction can cause an entire family.

Last year after a series of hearings on the impact of the illness of families and communities, we appropriated many more millions of dollars of research dollars in an effort to identify the cause or causes of the illness and, hopefully, a cure. More than $36 million were used by the National Institutes of Health for this purpose in 1984, compared to approximately $17 million in 1983. Another $3.5 million was earmarked for 5 clinical and research Alzheimer centers.

While this research effort continues, however, we must address the more immediate problem: that of assisting today's victims and their caregiving families. I was pleased that a proposal I introduced last year was included in the 1984 amendments to the Older American Act. Now State area agencies on aging are required to give priority community services to Alzheimer victims, and training grants will be available to students and volunteers who will learn the skilled and custodial care of such victims.

Nevertheless, while these are constructive steps we must enlarge upon our efforts and seek further relief for the burdened caregiving families. More than two thirds of Alzheimer victims are cared for at home—often for many, many years—before eventual institutional care is required. Most victims are not covered by Medicare, Medicaid, VA benefits, or private insurance. Most caregiving families need financial and respite relief from their "36-hour days."

The bill allows for a tax deduction from gross income for individual taxpayers who maintain a household which includes a dependent who has Alzheimer's disease or a related neurological or organic brain disorder. This measure would allow deductions of expenses, other than medical, which are related to the home care and adult day care of an Alzheimer victim.

Mr. Speaker, many families are trying to cope with an increasingly difficult situation from day to day, year to year, with no financial or professional help. While we seek to expand Government programs for such victims, we should provide some tax relief for those expenses related to their care in the home. Perhaps by such action, we can delay the more expensive and less personal institutionalization of these individuals. I enlist the support of my colleagues for speedy enactment of this bill.

The bill follows:

H.R. 468

A bill to provide a deduction from gross income for individual taxpayers who maintain home and adult daycare expenses of a dependent of the taxpayer who suffers from Alzheimer's disease or related organic brain disorders

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

ALICE PAUL, THE MOTHER OF THE ERA

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, on January 11, 1985, champions of women's rights throughout the world will celebrate the centennial anniversary of the birth of Alice Paul, the "mother" of the equal rights amendment. I am indeed proud to note that Alice Paul was a product of Moorestown, NJ, where she was born in 1885 and where she returned to live out her final days. Alice Paul died in 1977, at the age of 92, having lived a life fully dedicated to the cause of equality and justice for women.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity, at the opening of a new Congress, to remind my colleagues that we will again have an opportunity to further the cause of Alice Paul by working to ensure passage of the equal rights amendment during this Congress.

Alice Paul devoted her entire life to working to ensure that women receive equal treatment under the law. She grew up in a Quaker household, under the assumption that men and women were equal and it was only when she entered the larger world, as a student at Swarthmore and the University of Pennsylvania, that she discovered that this was not so. She began working as a social worker and applying her concern for the poor and disadvantaged in the sweatshops of New York and the slums of London. Her love of learning was such that she began collection degrees at the age of 20 and did not stop until she turned 43. When she turned 22, she went to England to study at the Woodbrooke Settlement for Social Work in Birmingham. It was there that she first became involved with the celebrated Pankhursts.

After having worked for 3 years with the Pankhursts in the British woman suffrage movement, she returned to the United States a militant suffragette ready to revive the dying suffrage movement here. In 1912, she came to Washington, DC, with two assistants to form the Congressional Committee for the National American Woman Suffrage Association [NAWSA] to lobby Congress and the President for passage of the 19th amendment, which granted suffrage to women. The group was to form the nucleus of the National Woman's Party, whose ranks Alice Paul was able to swell to 50,000. Until 1920, when the 19th amendment was ratified, Alice Paul organized massive demonstrations and speeches. She was responsible for the first suffragette picketing of the White House and her group of "Silent Sentinels" certainly made a lasting impression. Her most memorable demonstration took place in March 1913, 5 days before President Wilson's inauguration. She organized 5,000 women who marched down Pennsylvania despite attacks from hoodlums and lack of protection from the police. Nationwide press coverage of this march preempted stories on Wilson's inaugural festivities and redirected national attention on the woman's suffrage movement. As our Nation approaches another inaugural, I comment this march to the attention of my colleagues.

Even when suffrage was granted to women in 1920, Alice Paul did not rest. In 1923, she drafted the language for the equal rights amendment and had it introduced in the Congress for the first time. Although the Senate Judiciary Committee rewrote the language in 1943, Alice Paul's original words live on the amendment that has been reintroduced again and again in the 61 years that have passed. Having made her indelible mark on the history of the equal rights movement, Alice Paul continued to work hard for this cause until her death in 1977.

Throughout all those decades and despite the diligence of Alice Paul and many others, the ERA still remains a dream that needs to be realized. I hope that this Congress will have the courage to make this dream a reality. I urge my colleagues to join me in remembering Alice Paul, one of New Jersey's finest citizens, and her life which reflected the principles of courage and commitment to equality.●

HYMAN BOOKBINDER ON BLACK-JEWISH RELATIONS

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, one of the most respected, diligent, and effective advocates for social justice in America is Hyman Bookbinder, Washington Representative of the American Jewish Committee. Bookie is a person who has never been afraid to speak out on tough issues, and he has been characteristically outspoken—and in a cogent and persuasive way—on the question of Black/Jewish relations in America.

Last October, after we had adjourned for the year, he gave an eloquent speech to the Chicago Jewish Community Center forum on Black/Jewish relations. One need not agree with everything Bookie says in this speech—as I disagree, for example, with the passage in which he "regrets" one of the votes I cast—to appreciate its eloquence, its moral force, and its essential correctness. People in the Jewish community, people in the Black community, and Americans in general are fortunate to have a man like Hyman Bookbinder working as hard as he works for a better, more integrated, and just society.

I ask that his remarks be printed here.

REMARKS OF HYMAN BOOKBINDER, WASHINGTON REPRESENTATIVE OF THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE AT THE CHICAGO JEWISH COMMUNITY CENTER FORUM ON BLACK-JEWISH RELATIONS—OCTOBER 31, 1984

I have mixed feelings about participating in tonight's forum. On the one hand, it is always gratifying to share a platform with an outstanding and respected Black leader[1] and join in proclaiming our shared concerns and shared goals. But, on the other, it must be recognized that this forum has been prompted by concerns over the widely-held perception that Black-Jewish relations are in disarray, that a basic and acrimonious division has developed.

That perception is largely the result of the inevitable nature of news reporting. I'm not about to go into an attack on the media, but it is indeed a fact that by its very nature, journalism zeroes in on the conflicts, the unusual, the new, the extreme, the dramatic. This has been particularly true of the Black-Jewish relationship for the past twelve months. It is exactly a year ago that Jesse Jackson declared his intention to seek the nomination for President. Despite the efforts of the Jewish community to distinguish our concerns with Jesse Jackson from our attitude to the Black community and to Black aspirations, the newspapers and the airways for months were filled only with news and commentary of the deteriorating Black-Jewish relationship. This constant bombardment had its effects, unfortunately, and in each of the communities resentments and suspicions increased.

Not for a moment, let me assure you, have I dismissed the real issues that surfaced in the wake of the Jackson candidacy. It was right to react to the Hymietown report, to the report of large Arab contributions, to the Farrakhan excesses—but other things were going on during that period that deserved attention too—but didn't get any. Let me give you two illustrations:

One: On May 24, at the height of the bitterness flowing from the Farrakhan excesses, when the papers and airwaves were proclaiming a total Black-Jewish breakdown, two distinguished members of Congress made a most significant joint statement. They were Sidney Yates, the Dean of the Jewish delegation in Congress, from this area, and Julian Dixon, from California, the Chairman of the Black Congressional Caucus. That evening, the Philadelphia Board of Rabbis was honoring a Black Congressman, Bill Gray. The principal speaker was a Jewish Congressman, Howard Wolpe. Congressman Yates and Dixon issued a statement applauding this action by the Rabbis as one that reflected "the bond that exists between Blacks and Jews in Congress working together in the cause of social justice." And they went on to say that "We oppose anti-Black, anti-semitic, threatening, and demeaning racist statements, and we believe we must be vigilant in educating and criticizing those who make them." A very timely and significant statement, right? The answer, by the media, was no. Despite heavy publicity given to the event, not a word was to be found in the New York Times, the Washington Post, or any of the evening television broadcasts . . .

Illustration Two: On September 20, 1984, the pending Civil Rights Act of 1984, the bill that would have corrected the situation created by the Supreme Court in the Grove City case, was at a critical stage in the Senate. Thirteen top national Jewish leaders and thirteen major Black leaders joined in a statement calling the present situation "intolerable and inexcusable" . . . and "makes a mockey of our laws." Again, a timely and significant statement—given all the talk about Black-Jewish disarray—right? No, wrong again. Despite a well-attended press conference called to announce the joint statement—not a word appeared on the evening news or in the morning papers.

Every negative development in the Jackson or Farrakhan story had gotten full coverage—and every angry denunciation of one side or another had been top news. Small wonder, then, that there has been so much public talk about the conflict in Black-Jewish relations. That's why meetings like this one tonight have become necessary.

There are encouraging developments already underway to undo the damage that has resulted from the Jackson-Farrakhan events of 1984. Both Black leaders and Jewish leaders have been reaching out to one another—to reassure one another that the damage can be undone, to suggest that common agendas for the post-election period be developed, to inform the general public of this renewal of co-operation.

In my judgment, there has actually been less erosion in the relationships and the commitments on the part of America's Black and Jewish communities than has been so frequently reported. I can testify from my day-to-day activities on the Washington scene that on just about every major issue that involves our two communities, we have continued to work harmoniously and constructively. Moreover, as indicated earlier by the Yates-Dixon statement, I know that there are no two Congressional delegations that have a more paralled voting record than do the Black and Jewish members of the House. It is this record of substantial agreement, not only in Washington but across the country, that has made it possible for Black and Jewish leaders to come together despite the strains of the recent months.

Let me illustrate this co-operation by citing a few recent Congressional actions:

In October of 1981, the House disapproved the sale of sophisticated AWACs to Saudi Arabia. This was a matter of the highest priority to the Jewish community. All fourteen Black members then in the House voted with the Jewish community on that one. (More than 100 white members, I must note, vote for the sale.)

In May of this year, the Jewish community was solidly opposed to the Equal Access bill permitting religious activities on school grounds. All 19 Black members voting opposed the bill. (I regret to say six Jewish member voted for it!)

In June, all 15 Black members who voted on a key provision in the immigration bill which the Jewish community strongly opposed voted to defeat that provision.

In March, 12 Black Congressmen signed a letter to President Reagan opposing arms sales to Jordan unless Jordan joined the peace talks.

[1] Mr. James Compton, President, Chicago Urban League

In July, 12 Black Congressmen co-sponsored the bill to move the U.S. embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

And it wasn't a one-way street:

In August of 1983, 28 out of 30 Jewish House members voted to adopt the Martin Luther King Holiday legislation.

In September, 27 Jewish members voted for the Hawkins Community Renewal Act, a major job-creation law.

And in June, when the House passed the Civil Rights Act of 1984, all 30 Jewish members voted for it.

So we don't have to go back to the 1930's or '50s or '70s to remind ourselves that Jews and Blacks have had parallel concerns and have acted as partners. We don't have to recall the early marches, the bloody resistance, the deaths of Blacks and Jews as they protested together. Or to recall that 75 years ago Jews were prominent in helping create the National Urban League and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Of course, there are differences, some quite important, between the dominant views of Blacks and those of Jews. But it is also true that there are important differences within the Jewish community itself and within the Black community—even on the very issues which presumably divide the two communities from one another. The issue of quotas is a critical one, no doubt. How to resolve the Palestinian question is another one. But neither community is monolithic on either of these issues. However, even if they were, responsible leadership has to help its followers put even such questions in perspective, to remember the many critical concerns that we share: human rights, urban decay, education, poverty.

And even in those areas where we do have differences, let's try to understand more about the differences and to be tolerant of one another's positions. In the two illustrations I've already mentioned, in fact, the differences are not as great as generally perceived.

Take the issue of quotas, for example. How many Blacks know that the overwhelmingly majority of Jews and of Jewish organizations are in strong support of affirmative action—including the use of goals and timetables? How many know that many Jews and some Jewish organizations even support quotas when mandated by a court after a finding of conscious discrimination? How many know that every poll over the years has demonstrated consistently that a majority of Blacks reject preferential treatment and quotas? How many Jews know that?

In light of this, what explains the sweeping statements to be found in just about every story in the media on Black-Jewish relations about the terrible clash over "affirmative action" between the two communities? Why can't we hope to work together on the great area of agreement even on this complicated subject? Why can't we hope to persuade the great majority of Blacks that our support for affirmative action is genuine—and that they should try to understand, from our history, how we must reject quotas? Why can't we hope to persuade even more Jews that the progress in bringing Blacks and other minorities and women into the mainstream just has been too incomplete—and that effective programs of affirmative action are very much needed?

Take the issue of the Palestinians—or of Middle East policy generally. Why must the perception remain so strong that Blacks are hostile to Israel, that they side with the Arabs? It just isn't so—though some Blacks do show a greater identification with the Arab side. The data is not conclusive, but Gallup polls for some years have been asking Americans whether their sympathies lie more with Israel or with Arab nations. Early in 1984, white Americans chose Israel over the Arabs by 6 to 1. Blacks were less favorable to Israel than whites, but they still favored Israel over the Arabs by 3 to 1.

Many Blacks—especially young, educated Blacks—have identified with the Palestinians as part of their general pro-Third-World orientation. These feelings—sometimes leading to deep hostility to Israel and to Jews—are deeply held and should command our attention and response. We need civil, respectful dialogue—not angry, accusatory charges. The South African situation similarly needs thorough, honest airing to clear up major misunderstandings.

We need such respectful, tolerant dialogue across the board between Blacks and Jews, and, as I have said, much of it is already going on.

But Black and Jewish leadership have an even more serious challenge than getting themselves together again. I believe their bigger and more difficult job is assessing and correcting the damage and the erosion that has taken place within each of their respective communities. I see the need for the leaders in each community to speak out with courage and with frankness to each of their followers and say, in effect, "Cut it out. Look at the facts. The Blacks—or the Jews—are not your enemy. Let's look for solutions, not scapegoats."

The tensions of 1984 have been costly. Many Jews remain angry over what they feel was inadequate repudiation of hostile, even anti-semitic, manifestations in the course of the Democratic primaries. Many Blacks remain indignant over what they consider unwarranted Jewish rejection and condemnation of Jesse Jackson. The slow erosion in rank-and-file attitudes over the years of Blacks toward Jews and of Jews toward Blacks surely speeded up in 1984. But it didn't start in 1984.

It is a tragic thing indeed that it can no longer be said—as I have found it so heartwarming to declare in hundreds of speeches year after year—that Blacks show less approval of anti-semitism than do whites, and that Jews show substantially less hostility to Blacks than do non-Jewish whites. In the last few years, unfortunately, our surveys reveal that the Black attitude to Jews is now worse than the white—and that the attitudes of young, educated Blacks explain most of this change. And while the Jews still show less anti-Black bigotry than non-Jewish whites, the differential is declining. So there is a problem. And the problem, in my judgment, flows not nearly as much from objective changes in society or from irreconcilable differences on policies as from sheer ignorance and misunderstanding.

That is why I have dwelt tonight on recalling some of the evidence of Black-Jewish mutuality of interest, of co-operation. I do not call for ignoring of differences, for pretending there are no problems. But I ask for restraint, for balance, for truth.

Yes, there is some anti-semitism among Blacks. And there is some bigotry and hostility to Blacks in the Jewish community. It would indeed be a miracle if either or both of our communities could be totally free of the prejudices of the larger community of which each is a part. But for the sake of truth and for the sake of the harmony we all should be seeking, I plead for care before the ugly charge of racist or anti-semite be leveled against those with whom we may have some differences. Civility in discourse as well as in actual behavior is a precious instrument in human relations, and we should not kill it by careless, irresponsible talk.

Back in 1967, Martin Luther King, Jr. provided the model for leadership in both our communities when he spoke out forcefully in a letter to then-President of the American Jewish Committee, Morris Abram. "It is not only that anti-semitism is immoral," he wrote, "though that alone is enough. It is used to divide Negro and Jew, who have effectively collaborated in the struggle for justice . . . There has never been an instance of articulated Negro anti-semitism that was not swiftly condemned by virtually all Negro leaders with the support of the overwhelming majority. I have myself directly attacked it within the Negro community, because it is wrong. I will continue to oppose it, because it is immoral and self-destructive."

"Know thine Enemy" is an old truism—and remains true. Jews and Blacks may have differences, they may have different priorities—but they are not enemies. Each of our groups has ample reason for being angry at how the world is treating us. While our respective conditions are different in many respects, we remain two peoples unaccepted by many other peoples. Yes, we have every reason for being angry. But less at one another than at our real enemies.

Aristotle said it for all time: "Anybody can become angry—that is easy. But to be angry with the right person, to the right degree, and at the right time, and for the right purpose, and in the right way—that is not within everybody's power and is not easy."

Each of our communities should try to understand better the special agonies, the special problems, the special challenges of the other. If we did, then perhaps we could place things in better perspective . . . and make more reasonable demands on one another.

A personal word. In my talk this evening, I have cited statistics, I have recalled facts, I have tried to be objective and analytical. But I confess to anguish in having to make a case of this sort. For fifty years now I have been involved in one campaign after another for what I hope you will permit me to call social justice. In every one of these—for basic civil rights, for full and fair employment, for decent and fair housing, for women's rights, for voting rights, for a war against poverty, for Medicare and Medicaid—I have seen a disproportionate involvement of Jews and Blacks, disproportionate in the sense of significantly higher proportions of involvement of Jews and Blacks, compared with population ratios, in the development, the promotion, and the implementation of these social justice efforts. We were both motivated by self-interest, of course. But I have gotten to know too many men and women over the years who have struggled together, won and lost battles together, to believe that self-interest explains it all.

And, I hope I do not reflect any chauvinism in saying this, but I am particularly proud of the Jewish record in these causes. Initially there may have been group self-interest involved, but for many years now, American Jews, despite lingering anti-semitism and discrimination, have overcome many of the problems they once faced. Yet, more than any other social or ethnic or religious group, Jewish community organizations as well as countless numbers of individual Jews, have been prominent in the furtherance of social justice causes in which they do not have an immediate self-interest.

We Jews and Blacks have shared too much pain in the past, we have marched and cried and agonized together for too many years, we have dreamed the same dream for too many years, to permit our sons and our daughters to be blind to that heritage, to permit immediate differences to wipe out a glorious chapter in inter-group love and respect.

Let Jewish leaders say these things to their constituency. Let Black leaders say these things to theirs. And then let them together say these things to all America.●

RETURNED PEACE CORPS VOLUNTEERS MAKE RECOMMENDATIONS FOR 1985

HON. TONY P. HALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, as a former Peace Corps Volunteer who served in Thailand, I continue to have an active interest in the future of the Peace Corps. In my opinion, it is our most effective foreign aid program. Through the Peace Corps, we share with developing nations our most important resource: our own people.

As the Peace Corps approaches its 25th anniversary, the Returned Peace Corps Volunteers of Washington, DC, have issued a report outlining steps that can be taken to strengthen the performance of the Peace Corps and to make better use of the pool of Returned Peace Corps Volunteers. I believe the proposals to make greater use of Returned Peace Corps Volunteers and to educate Americans about the peoples and nations served by the Peace Corps deserve special attention. The over 100,000 Returned Peace Corps Volunteers have much to share with their own compatriots. The Peace Corps is a people-to-people program, and those who go overseas to teach end up learning much in exchange. This knowledge, in turn, should be shared as widely as possible in the United States.

For the benefit of my colleagues, the Report of the Task Force on Peace Corps Recommendations of the Returned Peace Corps Volunteers of Washington, DC, follows:

PEACE CORPS 1985: MEETING THE CHALLENGE

REPORT OF THE TASK FORCE ON PEACE CORPS RECOMMENDATIONS—DECEMBER 1984

The Peace Corps has completed nearly a quarter-century of volunteer service to developing nations. Over 100,000 Americans have served as volunteers. They have established a record of distinguished achievement of which Americans are understandably proud.

As President Reagan prepares for his second term, it is time to take stock of the Peace Corps, and to take steps to strengthen its role in America's relations with the nations of the Third World.

Our association of Returned Peace Corps Volunteers created a task force to develop recommendations for consideration during the planning period following the presidential elections of 1984. In this brief report, we present five specific recommendations that could be implemented in 1985. We believe implementation of these suggestions would improve Peace Corps' performance and provide for better utilization of the growing pool of Returned Peace Corps Volunteers.

President RPCV-W.

Task Force Chair.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

During 1985, the Peace Corps should:

1. Set a goal of 10,000 Volunteers in service with increased representation in South America and Asia;

2. Establish Goal III of the Peace Corps Act (educating Americans about the peoples and nations served) as a central mission of the agency;

3. Remove appointment of Peace Corps country directors from the political patronage system;

4. Appoint a qualified Returned Peace Corps Volunteer as the next Peace Corps Director, following the tenure of Loret Ruppe;

5. Create a Special Committee of Returned Peace Corps Volunteers to advise the Director on operational improvements in the Peace Corps.

PREFACE

The Peace Corps is approaching 25 years of service to the peoples of developing nations and to America. A steady stream of American volunteers has provided a unique and personal bridge linking the American people with the peoples of Africa, Asia and Latin America. Their pioneering projects in tens of thousands of communities in developing countries are widely viewed as one of America's most effective (and least expensive) programs of development assistance.

Peace Corps Volunteers have proven to be powerful transmitters of democratic and entrepreneurial values to millions of human beings with whom they have worked and lived. In the developing countries, thousands of community and national leaders, including cabinet ministers and even prime ministers, have been students and colleagues of American Peace Corps Volunteers.

Back home, over 100,000 Returned Peace Corps Volunteers are now resettled in the United States. They constitute one of the nation's most valuable pools of talent and experience. In schools, businesses, government, and community organizations, Returned Peace Corps Volunteers are making their presence felt by gradually enlarging the American vision of global leadership and our relations with the Third World.

Returned Peace Corps Volunteers are a valuable asset for their former host countries. They strengthen American attention to the necessities of global development. They are citizens with a special interest in improving bilateral relations between their countries of Peace Corps service and the United States.

At its inception, the Peace Corps symbolized a stronger American commitment to progress and freedom for the non-industrialized countries of the world. It provided a new dimension for America's world leadership. However, since the Vietnam War, the Peace Corps' symbolic role and the number of Peace Corps Volunteers have been diminished by slackened American attention to the arduous tasks of economic and social development in the Third World.

In his second term, President Reagan has the opportunity to reassert the prominence of the Peace Corps as a centerpiece of American efforts to help build stability, prosperity, and democracy in the Third World. The need is obvious. Some developing countries are wracked by hunger and famine on a scale unprecedented in modern history. Others are choked by foreign debt that impedes economic and social progress. The work performed by Peace Corps Volunteers will continue to be needed for years to come as many countries try to meet ongoing challenges of public health, agriculture, education, and small-enterprise development.

We, therefore, offer the following recommendations for strengthening the performance of the Peace Corps, and for making better use of the pool of Returned Peace Corps Volunteers.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. In 1985, the Peace Corps should set a goal of having 10,000 Volunteers in service overseas by 1988, with increased representation in Latin America and Asia.

During 1984, about 5,200 Peace Corps Volunteers were in service in 60 countries. For the past 18 years, the number of PCVs in service has been in steady decline—down from 15,000 in 1966, 9,000 in 1970, 7,000 in 1975, and 6,000 in 1980. Today, the worldwide distribution of volunteers has lost its original balance. Fewer than 200 PCVs serve on the South American continent in only two countries. Fewer than 300 serve on the Asian mainland. But, some 2,400 serve in Africa.

The Peace Corps has withdrawn from some of the largest and most important developing countries, including Nigeria, Ethiopia, India, Indonesia, Brazil, Colombia, and Chile. Volunteers no longer serve in Bolivia, Peru, Uruguay, Venezuela, Ivory Coast, Guinea, Uganda, Pakistan, Turkey, and South Korea.

The causes behind Peace Corps withdrawal from countries range from civil war and revolution to budget limitations and political misunderstandings. In some cases, withdrawal was necessary, at least temporarily; in other cases it was premature. And it is arguable that the Peace Corps image too often is that of a "poverty program"—something unacceptable to many of the larger and more strongly nationalistic developing nations.

The goals of pioneering new approaches to development and better understanding between peoples of the developing nations and Americans are not well served by sparse representation in some regions and outright exclusion from major developing nations. The Peace Corps has too good a record for the U.S. government to permit this decline to continue.

To impel the Peace Corps forward, we urge President Reagan to set a new goal of 10,000 Volunteers by 1988.

We must enable the Peace Corps to fill more of the viable host-country requests for Volunteers, to build upon effective programs, to improve faulty programs, and to take additional initiatives such as the new emphasis on programs of small-enterprise development and the proposed African Food Initiative.

The President should direct the Peace Corps to explore re-entry into some of the countries it has left, and to examine new programming possibilities that have yet to receive Peace Corps assistance.

We believe that additional Volunteers could serve effectively in South America and Asia. Conditions there are different from countries in Africa, but the human needs in health, agriculture, education, and private-sector development are still great.

As the number of PCVs expands in several Central American countries—and we urge great caution in creating even the appearance that Peace Corps is being used politically—balanced expansion in all regions becomes even more important.

Expansion everywhere must proceed with careful attention to such important considerations as program quality, availability of qualified recruits, PCV "saturation" in specific host countries, safety of Volunteers, and host country receptivity to the Peace Corps. Better planning for Volunteer placements will require a larger and skilled staff and sufficient lead time. But with a Presidential mandate and proper groundwork, the Peace Corps can and should play a substantially larger role in America's relations with the Third World.

2. Goal III of the Peace Corps Act should be fully implemented as a central mission of the Peace Corps and Returned Peace Corps Volunteers.

In establishing the Peace Corps, Congress charged the agency and PCVs with a responsibility for better educating Americans about the peoples and countries PCVs have served. Specifically, the Peace Corps Act states that one of the three central purposes of the Peace Corps is "to help promote a better understanding of other peoples on the part of Americans."

Goal III has been largely ignored for over 23 years, although it has the force of law. In the early years of the Peace Corps, this was understandable. The agency was preoccupied with implementing Goals I and II pertaining to operations overseas.[1]

Now, however, with a pool of over 100,000 Returned Peace Corps Volunteers throughout the United States, the means of effectively implementing Goal III are readily available. Over 25 state organizations of Returned Peace Corps Volunteers have been established in recent years, and a National Council has been formed. Many Returned Volunteers have a strong sense of responsibility for Goal III, and the time has arrived for Peace Corps to coordinate with organization of Returned Volunteers a major program of education about developing nations.

President Reagan should instruct the Peace Corps Director to make Goal III a priority of the agency over the next four years.

The emphasis should be twofold: the human needs of developing nations and American self-interest implicit in an expanding global economy and peace, stability, and freedom in the Third World.

We propose the following specific approaches to implementing Goal III:

A. Goal III should be a major theme of the Peace Corps 25th Anniversary activities, with RPCV organizations and the pool of 100,000 fully involved.

B. The Peace Corps should establish an office of development education and hire specialists to: (a) emphasize in training programs for PCVs the significance of Peace Corps responsibility for Goal III, (b) provide orientation for PCVs to Goal III aims and programs in Close-of-Service conferences, and (c) conduct regular workshops in the States for RPCVs on Goal III programs.

C. The Peace Corps Director and Peace Corps' supporters in the Administration and Congress should promote private-sector support to RPCV organization to help them fulfill their responsibility under Goal III.

D. The Peace Corps and RPCV organizations should prepare and disseminate information about the human needs of developing nations and about the significance of these countries to American interests. A goal should be set of bringing information about developing nations into America's classrooms so a new foundation of understanding can be established about the need for greater efforts in meeting the urgent challenge of global development.

3. The appointment of Peace Corps country directors should no longer be based on political patronage.

We recognize that party affiliation is an appropriate consideration for government appointments requiring the confidence of the President. The Peace Corps staff has been blessed over the years with many gifted and devoted persons. But it has been all too common in the past, and currently, to see some country directors appointed primarily on the basis of political patronage.

The result has too frequently been unqualified, and even inept, country directors. Other than the Volunteers, country directors are the people most crucial to Peace Corps success in the host countries. Appointment of unqualified people to these positions does serious harm to the effectiveness and credibility of the Peace Corps. They undermine the morale of Peace Corps Volunteers. They result in wasteful placements for Volunteers and faulty programming decisions.

This situation can be corrected by removing country directors from the Schedule C category of appointments. Capability in foreign languages, first-hand experience with development programs, and familiarity with the conditions of PCV assignment should be binding qualifications for overseas staff.

This step could sharply advance the effectiveness of Peace Corps programs overseas.

4. The next Director of the Peace Corps, following the tenure of Loret Ruppe, should be a Returned Peace Corps Volunteer.

We do not suggest that all future Directors of the Peace Corps must necessarily be RPCVs. The most important thing is to have effective Directors, as the agency has had in Loret Ruppe. However, in over 23 years, no Director of the Peace Corps has had the personal experience of serving as a Peace Corps Volunteer.

It is time to correct this anomaly. The symbolic and substantive importance of appointing an RPCV agency director should not be underestimated. Peace Corps programming has improved in some respects over the years, but an RPCV Director could bring first-hand experience to an aggressive, exhaustive search for sounder approaches to development programming and new initiatives. An RPCV Director could speak with special credibility in recruiting qualified Volunteers. An RPCV Director could mobilize the pool of RPCVs in relation both to Goal III and overseas operations.

Whether RPCVs or not, future Peace Corps Directors should possess substantial Third-World experience at the grass-roots level.

5. A Director's Special Committee of Returned Peace Corps Volunteers should be established to advise and assist the Peace Corps on improved operations.

In the course of preparing these recommendations, we received many constructive suggestions related to Peace Corps operations. We strongly recommend that the Peace Corps Director appoint a Special Committee of Returned Peace Corps Volunteers to provide ongoing guidance on how to improve Peace Corps performance.

This committee should consist of RPCVs who have become leaders in business, education, community organizations, and government. Their responsibility should be to consult regularly with newly returned Volunteers and RPCV organizations and then develop recommendations related to recruitment, Goal III, overseas programming, public relations, and other matters.

Returned Peace Corps Volunteers of Washington (RPCV-W) is a non-partisan organization. Inquiries related to this report should be directed to Matthew Cossolotto (703/998-1720) or Roger Landrum (202/966-5461), or in writing to RPCV/W, P.O. Box 4924, Washington, D.C. 20008.●

[1] Goal I is "to help the people of interested countries and areas in meeting their needs for trained manpower." Goal II is "to help promote a better understanding of Americans on the part of the peoples served."

INTRODUCTION OF CLEAN WATER AND WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT LEGISLATION

HON. JAMES J. HOWARD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing two major pieces of legislation that were approved overwhelmingly by this body last year but were not acted on by the other body.

I am pleased to join with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Water Resources, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER], the ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STANGELAND], the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Water Resources, in introducing H.R. 6, the Water Resources Conservation, Development, and Infrastructure Improvement and Rehabilitation Act of 1985.

This bill, which is so important to the development of our Nation's water resources, was approved overwhelmingly on three separate occasions last year by this body. However, it was never even brought to a vote in the other body.

The bill is the first major revision of Federal water policy in 50 years. It shapes policy, sets priorities and establishes goals for the use of our water resources for the rest of the 20th century.

Let it be clear that this bill is not a simple listing of projects although there are many valid projects that have been delayed for too long. It is a major policy initiative which was under consideration for 3 years and focuses on cost-sharing, user fees and equity.

H.R. 6 authorizes construction of six deep-draft ports to maintain this Nation's competitive position with other maritime nations. Under the provisions of the bill, non-Federal interests would be responsible for 50 percent of the costs below 45 feet. In order to provide an adequate and assured source of funding for port construction, the bill creates a $2 billion annual trust fund to be collected from customs revenues.

The bill also authorizes construction of seven critically-needed inland waterway projects. One-third of the cost of these improvements would be paid by the Inland Waterways Trust Fund which was created in 1978 from a gasoline tax on commercial users of the waterways.

The bill authorizes construction of 72 flood control projects and rationalizes the Federal cost-sharing policy for flood control. Under this provision, non-Federal interests would be responsible for 25 to 30 percent of the cost.

A new $800 million a year loan program for the repair, rehabilitation and maintenance of municipal water supply systems is created. In these cases, the communities receiving the loans must repay 100 percent of the funds to the Federal Government.

Finally, the bill deauthorizes 317 projects with construction costs exceeding $11 billion. This is an important step in ensuring that outdated and unneeded projects are not built.

I am also joining with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER], and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STANGELAND], in introducing the Water Quality Renewal Act of 1985. This bill, the reauthorization of the Clean Water Act, was passed by this body on June 26 by a vote of 405 to 11. This bill will reestablish this Nation's commitment to clean water for the rest of the decade. Once again, it was not even brought to the floor in the other body.

This bill renews the commitment we made to the American people during the 1970's that the Federal Government would assist in providing resources to clean up our waters. We are proposing a reauthorization of the construction grants for sewage treatment plants as well as an additional $1.6 billion a year loan program. The total amount would be $19 billion over 4 years, which is a meager amount when compared to our Nation's environmental needs.

The bill also sets firm but reasonable deadlines for industry to comply with the pollution control requirements of the Clean Water Act. It will allow rational enforcement by the Environmental Protection Agency while ensuring that the cleanup of the Nation's waters will continue.

The bill sets up new programs as well, including a bay and estuary cleanup program, a toxic hot spot cleanup program, a major harbor cleanup initiative, and limitations on the amount of sewage that has not received secondary treatment that can be discharged into our Nation's fragile estuaries.

I urge my colleagues to support these two bills which have been reintroduced in the same form they were passed last year by the House.

It is vital that these bills be passed as quickly as possible in order to have a serious chance of enactment. Only by getting an early start can we expect the type of pressure to build that would bring about action in the Senate. It is unlikely that we will see any action in the Senate without such pressure.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to allow quick passage of this legislation as it was passed last year by the House. Changes, if necessary, can be considered during conference. However, without early passage it is unlikely that we will have a conference

These bills were worthy of the overwhelming support of the Members last year and they should receive the same support again. The House must stand behind clean water and the proper use of our Nation's water resources.●

DEPENDENT CARE TAX CREDIT FOR NONEMPLOYED TAXPAYERS

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to allow the dependent care tax credit for nonemployed taxpayers.

Current law allows employed taxpayers to claim a tax credit up to $4,800 for a couple and $2,400 for a single person for expenses incurred for the care of a dependent who is physically or mentally incapable of self-care. My purpose would amend current law by allowing the same tax credit to nonworking taxpayers.

Many older Americans, often living on taxable pensions and/or dividend income, are responsible for ill spouses or aged parents. These individuals should be allowed the same tax credit as employed taxpayers.

Increased life expectancy is bringing about many new and exciting opportunities for the aged, but the very same factors are placing tremendous strains on our traditional methods of caring for the dependent elderly—and on the family caregiver. Long-term debilitating illnesses such as Alzheimer's disease require constant attention by caregiving spouses and children, a load that can be eased by providing some financial reimbursement for supportive services including adult day care.

About 4.9 million adults living in our communities need the assistance of others in carrying out every day activities, with the need for assistance sharply increasing with age. Another group of older Americans, approximately 25 percent of those presently residing in our nursing homes, do not need to be there. As our older population increases dramatically over the next two decades, more and more individuals will be needing community services to delay as long as possible the more costly and less preferred nursing home care.

The key to such alternative care to institutionalization is the caregiver, usually a spouse or older child with children and responsibilities of their own.

The family caregiving role is very prominent in other countries, as it once was in our own. Today, with high health care costs and attempts by hospitals to curtail Medicare expenses, more and more older people are again relying on family members to bridge the gap between home care and acute hospital and nursing home care. In-home health services and adult day care are responses to this need.

The adult day care concept, similar to scope to that of day care for children, provides assistance to those families who must be freed temporarily from their responsibilities in caring for elderly dependent adults. The number of adult day care centers in the United States went from a dozen in 1970 to nearly 700 in 1981 and now stands at around 1,000, serving about 25,000 elderly daily. But most Government programs and insurance plans do not fully reimburse the costs. Costs range from $11 a day to $50 a day with additional charges where transportation is provided. Nursing homes, by contrast, charge an average $30 to $40 a day, some as much as $70—7 days a week.

Congress has increased research funds to study the cause and cure of Alzheimer's disease and other debilitating illnesses, but until these mysteries are solved, hundreds of thousands are taken care of by their families until they are eventually institutionalized. For example, during the first two stages of the disease, Alzheimer victims are well served by the few adult day care centers in this country. More centers are being created to serve these unfortunate patients with trained personnel who provide families with needed advice—and respite from their ordeal which often lasts for many, many years. By expanding tax credits, we provide all caregiving families, whatever their income source, an incentive to maintain this role for a longer period of time, thereby potentially delaying or preventing the need for costly institutional care. We also will be helping to prevent the complete depletion of family assets used to finance services over an expanded period of time.

Moreover, there is evidence that the public strongly endorses this concept. A 1981 study conducted by Lou Harris for the National Council on Aging showed that 90 percent of those interviewed approved of tax assistance for families who provide home care for the elderly.

These factors, coupled with the predictions about the future need for nursing home care, make efforts to sustain current patterns of family care for the disabled even more vital. Assuming current utilization patterns, the number of nursing home residents is estimated to increase to 2.1 million persons in 2003, a 57-percent increase over the number of institutionalized persons in 1978. Given current fiscal constraints, we must find ways to supplement the current family caregiving role, not to supplant it. Revising the Tax Code to provide incentives and support for the family is an important step in this direction.

H.R. 467

NATIONAL CHILD SAFETY WEEK

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to proclaim September 8 through 14, 1985, as "National Child Safety Week."

Every year untold numbers of children throughout the United States disappear from their homes. Tragically, many of these young, defenseless children are the victims of sexual and physical abuse.

Great strides have been made over the past 4 years to educate the American public to the dangers threatening our children. The Missing Children Act of 1982, the Missing Children Amendments of 1984, and the establishment of a National Center for Missing and Exploited Children are a few of the many steps which have been taken nationwide to ensure the safety of our youth. However, much still remains to be done.

Recently I participated in a Child Safety Day sponsored by the Rotary Club of the North Palm Beaches in conjunction with Child Keyppers of Florida. Throughout the day children and their parents visited a 10 station area where the children's vital statistics were compiled and parents received information on how to protect their children. At each station, volunteers recorded a child's height and weight, took his photo, obtained hair samples, and recorded fingerprints and dental impressions. After visiting all 10 stations, parents were given packets containing all of the descriptive vital information on their children which would aid law enforcement officials in finding them if they were to runaway or be abducted.

Many of my colleagues in the House and Senate have also taken an active role in assisting similar projects in their own district or State. I heartily applaud their efforts. No doubt, we all have seen what an invaluable purpose these projects have had in educating adults and children.

The establishment of a special week to commemorate child safety will draw needed attention to the tragedy of missing children and will help educate communities throughout the Nation about this problem and what can be done to help solve it. Ensuring children's safety is one of the most important issues of our time, and it should be one of our Nation's highest priorities.

To date, many groups like the North Palm Beach Rotary Club and Child Keyppers are working with local and State law enforcement agencies to promote child safety. Through our combined efforts, we can better protect our children. Therefore, I encourage my colleagues to join with me in cosponsoring this important resolution.●

SOVIET CRUISE MISSILE FIRED OVER NORWEGIAN TERRITORY

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, on December 28, a sea-launched Soviet cruise missile was reported to have been fired over Norwegian territory and to have crash landed in Finland.

We do not yet know whether the missile was nuclear-tipped, whether the missile was over Scandanavia intentionally, or whether Soviet technicians were simply unable to steer it away from the area during testing because of technical difficulties.

What we do know is that blatant Soviet violations of Scandanavian territorial waters have occurred numerous times in the past, including the Soviet whiskey-class sub that ran aground in Karlskrona, Sweden in 1981. Thus, last Thursday's cruise missile incident was by no means an isolated act against Scandanavian countries by the Soviets.

As United States and Soviet negotiators sit down at the bargaining table in Geneva to discuss arms control talks, let's not trivialize such dangerous intrusions or allow them to be swept under the rug of American and European public opinion. Any negotiations must take into full account this continuing string of apparently intentional Soviet transgressions.●

MAJORITY LEADER JIM WRIGHT REMEMBERS LBJ THE BRIDGE BUILDER

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of our colleagues to a very special address delivered during the recent adjournment by our colleague, Majority Leader JIM WRIGHT. Last October, JIM WRIGHT gave the annual address of the Lyndon Baines Johnson Distinguished Lecture Series sponsored by Southwest Texas State University, located in my congressional district in the city of San Marcos. His remarks were entitled "Build Bridges, Not Walls."

The speech makes for thoughtful and enlightening reading and puts into new perspective the life and times and heartfelt principles of our late President Lyndon Johnson. Committed to civil rights and social justice when it might have been politically expedient not to be, Lyndon Johnson was a complicated man. JIM WRIGHT'S speech captures the essential elements of LBJ's complex character. I certainly commend the majority leader's address to the serious attention of all Members fo this body.

The full text of his speech follows:

BUILD BRIDGES, NOT WALLS

Tonight as we celebrate in this lecture the public career of Lyndon Baines Johnson, I want us to consider two very familiar models of the building trades. I invite you to think with me about walls and bridges—and about those who build them.

Walls and bridges! Not simply the physical structures of wood and masonry and metal, but in their larger sense—things that divide and things that unite. Almost everything we do in our inter-personal relations and as a society builds either a wall or a bridge.

Either we separate people from their natural destiny by means of a wall or we connect them to it by a bridge. Walls of misunderstanding disconnect people from one another. Bridges of understanding connect them.

I hope you will be builders of bridges.

LBJ: BRIDGE BUILDER

Nothing could be more symbolic of the years of Lyndon Johnson's public service. He spent a great portion of his life tearing down walls and erecting bridges in their place.

Our government depends upon a series of alliances, basic attitudes and understandings which build bridges across the geographical and ideological dividing lines that otherwise would separate us. Lyndon Johnson was a practitioner—perhaps this century's most skilled practitioner—of concensus.

As Senate Majority Leader and as President, he repeatedly fashioned compromises to span the chasms of partisan separation.

Lyndon Johnson's bridges reached across the Senate aisle to the other political party and down Pennsylvania Avenue to the other branch of government.

He was an apostle of bipartisan foreign policy during the Eisenhower presidency.

Lyndon Johnson helped tear down the walls of alienation which for a century had divided north from south.

In this way he helped make America truly live up to those words: "One nation under God indivisible."

His was the hand that guided through the Senate the first Civil Rights law since Reconstruction days. Along with Sam Rayburn he provided the leadership which kept Texas on the path of peaceful compliance with the Supreme Court's ruling on school integration. As much as any American, he broke down the walls of superstitious separation between the races.

Lyndon Johnson's massive emphasis upon American education built bridges of opportunity over which millions, previously shut out, have crossed canyons of denial into productive careers and fulfilling lives.

In a major speech at Johns Hopkins University—and in literally hundreds of unadvertised overtures—Lyndon Johnson tried to build a bridge of peaceful understanding with the North Vietnamese, and his failure to do so was the major disappointment of his career.

Lyndon Johnson was a bridge builder.

WALL BUILDING

The builders of walls, on the other hand, make a cohesive society infinitely more difficult. A few years ago, Kevin Phillips wrote an article in Harper's Magazine entitled "The Balkanization of America." He wrote of a growing spirit of parochialism which he said is in the process of splintering our society and disintegrating our fundamental national unity. Too many Americans, he concluded, have begun to think of themselves first as members of some particular economic or social or geographic or religious group—and only secondly if at all as Americans.

In the Congress itself, there has grown in the past few years a Black Caucus, an Hispanic Caucus, a Steel Caucus, a Farm Caucus, a Northeast Caucus, a Sunbelt Caucus, a Tourism Caucus, a Coal Caucus, and a Blue Collar Caucus, just to name a few. As one whose job it is to try to synthesize a course of common action from such heterogeneity of interests, I can attest that the tendency to build walls of division—the us-against-them syndrome—is dissolving some of the glue which once held us together, and making the process of governing an infinitely more difficult and more challenging task.

The very words we speak and write are meant to be bridges of communication. Words and language and ideas are what distinguish man from beast. The curator of a big city zoo once told me that baby gorillas advance more rapidly than infant children for the first 18 months of their lives. After that, the gorilla's learning process almost stops, while that of the human child continues at an ever-faster pace.

The obvious difference is that humans alone have a verbal and written language by which each generation can communicate the store of knowledge to each succeeding generation. That's what we call education. Other members of the animal kingdom learn only by imitation.

Language is the bridge to knowledge. Education is the bridge to human progress. Without records, without books, without the tradition of learning which mankind has evolved, we still would be brutish creatures. There would have been little evolution from Cro-Magnon Man.

Those who abuse language as a instrument of division—those who use it to divide people against people, class against class, race against race, religion against religion, or region against region, prostitute its purpose. They erect walls with those building blocks that were intended for bridges.

And that is why book burning—such as was practiced by the Nazis in Germany and others before them and since—is such a crime against humanity. Its ultimate goal is the walling off of some part of our collective memory of the past or of our awareness of the possibilities of the future.

NATIONS THAT BUILD WALLS

Some governments and human institutions are essentially builders of walls. In the Third Century, B.C., the Chin Dynasty in China built the world's longest continuous wall to insulate the entire country from what the Chinese leaders considered the evils of foreign influence. Nobody could get in or out. Behind this wall, China languished for 1,800 years and feel hopelessly behind the rest of the world—because it had erected a barrier which mankind's new discoveries and increasing knowledge, unapproved ideas, outside influence.

There could be no more grotesque example than the Berlin Wall whose purpose was not to keep others out but to convert a whole society into a prison, to hold captive the citizens of an entire nation. The refusal of any country to permit the out-migration of citizens who want to leave is a confession of moral and social impoverishment and economic destitution.

A FEW AMERICAN WALLS

America through most of its history has been building bridges. Yet, we fall prey to wall-building from time to time. In periods of economic recession, we are tempted to raise tariffs and quotas and other impediments to the flow of world trade. These are economic walls.

Those who would throw roadblocks in the way of free expression are builders of intellectual walls.

We have seen in this election year the sad, demented storm trooper syndrome cropping up again after all these years on a few college campuses across the country. This is the mentality of those who would shout speakers down with boorish heckling or drown them out with childish chanting rather than hearing them out in mature civility. The practice is too juvenile for a college campus, too childish even for junior high school. It is unworthy of educated men and women. It has no place in a free society. To wall off speakers with vocal screeching from those who would like to hear them is the antithesis of intellectuality. It is a throwback to prehistoric times and a denigration of all that we stand for as a people.

Pope John XXIII built bridges to a warmer fellowship between religious denominations. There are some in organized religion who would arrogate to themselves the attributes of deity and arbitrarily exclude others. They build religious walls. Some of them would endow their political prejudices with religious justification.

From the beginning there have been some not content to be created in God's image, but intent instead upon recreating God in their own image.

The builders of walls usually operate from fear. All of the legal and economic tricks which for years kept blacks and other minorities from voting and getting an education and sharing fully in the opportunities and privileges of a free society were walls. They were built, for the most part, by people who honestly feared that—unless the minorities were walled off and kept "in their place"—there would be fewer privileges left for themselves.

They see freedom as a thing of short supply, to be hoarded—not as a blessing to be shared.

A decade ago we saw certain civil rights groups building their own walls in retaliation, burning the bridges of understanding that did exist, blaming white people in general with all of their troubles, and defending violence in the name of black power. In this way, one wall begets another. Communications break down, and riots break out!

And the nation begins to break apart.

But as Robert Frost wrote: "Something there is that doesn't love a wall, that wants it down."

BRIDGES TO THE AMERICAN DREAM

Given occasional abbreviations, the history of our country has been a long, sometimes sporadic but generally continuous process of building bridges.

We have been breaking through the ceilings, those horizontal walls which hold people down, and through the perpendicular walls that hold people in. We have become the most upwardly mobile, the least economically and socially stratified of the world's societies. From the beginning, this has been our most distinctive national characteristic.

We did not set out to create an aristocracy and install it as a ruling class. Nor did we destroy the aristocracy and supplant it with a dictatorship of the proletariat. Our goal has been to expand the privileged class until it shared its benefits with the humblest citizens of the land.

Ours was to be an aristocracy with a difference. Not a nobility to which some are born and others forever denied, but one to which all could aspire and which most could attain. Not a snobbish aristocracy of exclusiveness, but one which constantly seeks to enlarge its membership. One not of special privilege, but of universal privilege whose members qualify by self-preparation and by assuming the responsibilities which go with privilege.

This is what came to be called "the American dream." It is the promise of a society in which the humblest child born of the most improvident circumstance may have as his or her birthright an education unlimited by lack of opportunity, an equal right to vote and participate in the political process, the right to useful work, and the very real chance to own property.

In starts and stops, in bursts of creative energy and pauses for regrouping, we have moved consistently toward those goals. They are not yet fully realized for all of America's children.

But consider what progress we made in two short decades—from 1960 to 1980. In those 20 years, the number of college graduates annually receiving degress increased by over 150%. The growth in graduate education was even more spectacular. By 1980, the nation was conferring approximately 400,000 masters, compared to 78,000 in 1960—an increase of some 400%. For millions of Americans, these were the bridges of opportunity.

By 1980, we had reached the point where 79% of our non-white youth were completing high school. Not enough, but better by far than the 53% which were able to do so in 1960.

In the age group of those receiving baccalaureate degrees this year, one out of every four Americans will complete college. In 1960, the figure was not quite one in eight.

AN ERA OF RETRENCHMENT

And yet—and yet, there is something deeply disquieting in the present scene. In the past three or four years we seem to have entered an era of retrenchment in which our historic progress has been temporarily stalled. The number of high school and college graduates, as a percentage of our population, has remained at a plateau for the past three years and shows alarming signs of turning downward.

Economic conditions in general, and declining availability of student loans and financial assistance in particular, may foredoom the accessibility of higher education to a declining percent of our young population. That, in my judgment, would be tragic!

It would be historically retrogressive, wasteful of our most precious resource, and morally indefensible.

The very best investment our country ever made—with the possible exception of the Louisiana Purchase—was the G.I. Bill of Rights with its educational opportunities immediately following WW II.

Not only did it enlarge the intellectual horizon and enrich the social and economic fabric of our nation beyond anyone's capacity to measure. It actually returned a very handsome profit to the government itself—at least $20 for every $1 of public investment—in the form of higher taxes paid by reason of the enhanced earning capacities of the hundreds of thousands of Americans who availed themselves of those educational benefits.

Today we quibble and quarrel in petty puerility about whether the nation can afford student loans, Pell grants and work-study opportunities. Like Nebuchadnezzar, we seem to have forgotten the dream.

There is something fundamentally deranged in the standard of values of our nation when we reduce bilingual education, vocational education and job training by 28% in one year while calling for approximately the same amount of money to build more prisons.

A part of the American dream has been the promise of home ownership. In 40 years, we increased the reality from 30% of American families to 70%. It is a sorry commentary today that only 3% of the newly-formed family units can qualify to buy a house because of the suffocating level to which interest rates have been permitted to rise.

That, in a society which would build bridges instead of walls, is intolerable.

Machines and weapons of the most infinite sophistication cannot assure national security nor restore productivity to a nation which ever forgets that the ultimate guarantor of defense and ultimate machine of enhanced production, that which has ever been the hallmark of American military and industrial superiority, is the cultivated mind and motivated spirit of the trained and educated American. Without the bridges of educational and economic opportunity, ever widening to accommodate ever more people, we cannot be first in industrial production nor preeminent in national defense.

INTERNATIONAL BRIDGES

The exchange of students across national borders is one of the best ways to build bridges of peace. It is shortsighted folly on our part that last year Cuba and the Soviet Union granted 7,500 full-time study scholarships in their countries to promising Central American students, while the United States granted fewer than 50. Then we wonder why some of our closest neighbors are tempted to look elsewhere for leadership.

On this day I ask you to make a commitment—that you will revive the American dream, tear down the walls of alienation that will still exist between our people, and complete the bridges that we have begun.

When this has been done, there still will be work to do, and bridges yet to build.

If democracy is to triumph in the underdeveloped world, bridges of literacy and learning must be extended to the humblest families. They must be given a chance to make a decent wage—a change to borrow, to get a start, at a rate of interest they can pay—a chance to own a modest home or a small farm of their own. In emerging nations, free societies will thrive only if they build bridges across the impenetrable walls that too often have separated class from class.

Somehow, someday, the vision of humanity must be employed to tear down the walls of fear and hostility and create in their place bridges of understanding between the people of the United States and the people of the Soviet Union.

This is no doubt the most difficult work of all. But it could be the most rewarding.

We live in a world bristling with 50,000 nuclear warheads with a total destructive capacity one million times greater than the bomb that devastated Hiroshima and ushered in the nuclear age.

Every minute in 1984, 30 children somewhere in the world will die for want of food or inexpensive vaccines; and every minute the military budgets of the world will absorb $1.3 million for the unproductive implements of terror.

In this year alone, Russia and the United States will spend more than half a trillion dollars upon armaments. Just think of the legitimate needs a mere fraction of this money could meet if diverted to constructive uses. Think of the untold good it could perform if only some of this could be spent instead upon foodstuffs and medicine, upon research and disease eradication, upon libraries and books and schools and hospitals—on bridges rather than walls—on people rather than implements of destruction.

These bridges of understanding between people of different nations will not be finished this year, or this decade, or perhaps in your lifetimes. But if the mind and purpose of man can unite to construct the bridges to a peaceful world, they will serve as no other thing can to bless the generations yet unborn.●

MEDICAID DENTAL AMENDMENT

HON. GERRY SIKORSKI

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a Medicaid amendment which has become necessary because of action by some States in limiting payment for services which are provided by health professionals other than physicians. There are a variety of health services which are covered under the Medicaid Program which can legally be provided by a dentist. I have been informed of State actions which deny payment when the service is provided by a dentist when it is within the scope of the dentist's license but provide reimbursement to a physician for the same service. I am introducing legislation to assure that when services are provided by a properly qualified dentist the State Medicaid Program cannot discriminate in the reimbursement to that dentist.

In 1980, we adopted a similar amendment for the Medicare Program. This amendment to Medicaid is necessary to assure equity in its implementation. I hope my proposal can be favorably considered in the near future.●

TERRORISM IN THE WORLD

HON. MARK D. SILJANDER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, one of the most serious security threats facing our Nation is terrorism. The article in the November issue of the "Journal of Defense and Diplomacy" by U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, the Honorable Jeane Kirkpatrick, captures the essence of what this issue is all about.

I commend this article to my colleagues:

THE UNAUTHORIZED VIOLENCE OF TERRORISM

(By Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick)

The most difficult problem in understanding politics is, I believe, to see phenomena as they are, without confusion or mystification: simply to observe who does what to whom, to hear what he says about his actions and to observe their consequences. The more simply and clearly phenomena can be observed and described, the greater the possibility that their meaning and significance can be understood.

What the terrorist does is kill, maim, kidnap, torture. His victims may be children in the schoolroom, travelers like those at Entebbe or Lod Airport, industrialists returning home from work, political leaders, diplomats in Paris, London, Los Angeles, legislators like those on whom machine guns were turned in the 1950s in Washington. They may have no particular political identity, like the café-goers in Goldenberg's Jewish restaurant in Paris, or they may be political symbols, like Aldo Moro or Pope John Paul II.

A terrorist's victims could be anyone, and they could be kidnapped, maimed or simply blown to bits. But one defining characteristic of the terrorist is his choice of method. The terrorist chooses violence as the instrument of first resort. Yet, terrorism is distinguished from violent crime. Crime, too, is unauthorized violence against persons who are not at war.

How does terrorism differ from simple crime? The difference lies not in the nature of the act but in the understanding of its perpetrator, however vague, of what he is doing. Terrorism is political in a way that other violent crime is not. The terrorist acts in the name of some political, some public purpose. "Political man," Harold Laski wrote, "is one who projects private assets onto public objects and rationalizes them in the name of a conception of the public." The members of Murder, Inc., acted for private purposes. John Hinckley, as I understand it, attempted to kill President Reagan for essentially private reasons. But the killers who sprayed bullets into Goldenberg's, like those who attempted the murder of Edén Pastora, had a public goal in view.

POLITICAL WAR

Terrorism is a form of political war. We may note that while the conceptions of the actor transform the act, and that while a purpose related to a public goal makes an act political, it does not make it moral. And a public purpose does not make a terrorist who has been arrested a political prisoner. Terrorism should also be distinguished from conventional war, and terrorists from soldiers who also wield violence. A soldier uses violence in accordance with the law of his society against enemies designated by legally constituted authorities. Soldiers use violence where a state of belligerence is recognized to exist. A terrorist engages in violence in violation of law against persons who are not at war with him.

Even in this century of total war, when civilian targets are drawn into war by aerial bombing and resistance movements, belligerency is at least a condition known to all parties in a conflict. The Nazis occupying the streets of Paris understood that all French civilians were not conquered, but that for many the war continued. They understood that some unknown portion of the civilian population was at war and had not acquiesced in the surrender signed by France's latest government. Many civilians also understood that the occupation, in itself, was proof of the continuing belligerence.

THE VICTIMS

Terrorists use violence against people who do not understand themselves to be at war. The victims of terrorist attacks are unarmed, undefended and unwary. The point is—and it seems to me crucial—that victims perceive themselves as civilians. They do not understand that they are regarded, or may be regarded, by someone else as belligerents in an ongoing war. This is the reason that one U.S. government study emphasized that terrorism is politically motivated, premeditated violence perpetrated against noncombatant targets by subnational groups or clandestine state agents. If we listen to the terrorist, we understand that he is at war against us. Terrorism is a form of war against a society and all who embody it, and war is always, as von Clausewitz emphasized, "a real political instrument, a continuation of politics by other means, an act of violence intended to compel our opponent to fulfill our will."

Terrorist war is part of a total war in which the whole of society is seen as the enemy and all the members of a society are considered appropriate objects for violent actions. It is absolute war because its goal is absolute destruction of society, and it accepts annihilation of persons as an appropriate means. Terrorists are the shock troops in a war to the death against the values and institutions of a society and of the people who embody it.

TERRORISM AND TOTALITARIANISM

The affinities between terrorism and totalitarianism are multiple. Both politicize the whole of society—the terrorist by making the whole of society the object of his violence, his war; the totalitarian by making society, culture and personality the object of his plans and actions. Both consider violence an appropriate means for their political ends and use violence as an instrument of first resort aggressively. They understand that smashing a society means smashing people.

Both terrorists and totalitarians reject basic moral principles associated with Judaeo-Christian civilization, such as the value and the responsibility of the individual, and they reject prohibitions against the use of offensive force in social or international affairs. Both terrorists and totalitarians act and see themselves as acting in the name of a new morality and on the basis of a different epistemology. Both see their violence justified by their higher morality whose transcendent collective ends justify and demand violation of conventional morality and the sacrifice of people whose membership in the old society makes them expendable. Both permit and even encourage expression of aggressive murderous instincts, whose repression Freud correctly emphasized as a precondition of civilization.

The social relations of both terrorists and totalitarians to others is dominated by hostile intent. The enemy is everywhere, struggle is inevitable, it is unending, it is total. But despite the many affinities of terrorism and totalitarianism, the two need also to be distinguished. Totalitarianism is the property of a certain kind of society, polity. One of the instruments of that polity is terror. Terrorism, on the other hand, may be the property of individuals, small groups or governments that do not, in fact, possess total power, whose rulers may have totalitarian aspirations but whose society has not yet become totalitarian. I take it that both Libya and Syria are examples of such states.

Raymond Aron described three kinds of terror as present in the Soviet experience: (1) that used by a party or faction against parties or factions hostile to them, (2) that which aims at eliminating class enemies, such as the liquidation of the kulaks as a class, and (3) that which turns terror previously used against class enemies or adversaries against all those who disagree with the ruler. This third category permits anyone who is in any way objectionable to be classifed as an enemy of the people. All these categories of terror are present in the violence of the terrorist. Totalitarian society is saturated with coercion. Nonetheless, not all coercive societies are totalitarian, and not all societies that support, sponsor and harbor terrorists and terrorism are totalitarian.

The most important link between totalitarianism and terrorism seems to me to be that the most important totalitarian state of our time is also the principal supporter and sponsor of international terrorism as a form of political action. And, second, that those who pursue power by terrorism aspire to form totalitarian societies. Orwell wrote, "It is not merely that power corrupts, so also do the ways of attaining power. Therefore, all efforts to regenerate society by violent means lead to the cellars of the NKVD." He also said that "the essential act is the rejection of democracy—that is, of the underlying values of democracy. Once you have decided upon that, Stalin, or at any rate someone like Stalin, is already under way."

In Nicaragua, rejection of democracy by the Sandinista junta and the choice of the method of violence has led indeed to someone like Stalin, someone who has forced Miskitos into internment camps or exile, who has imposed prior censorship, absorbed free trade unions, controlled businessmen, repressed the Catholic Church and its leaders and who sees Nicaraguans who want a voice in their own government as enemies of the people.

It happened, too, in Grenada, where Maurice Bishop and his colleagues seized power by force and set about creating on that tropical island full-blown totalitarianism. It happened, of course, in Vietnam, where the North imposed a military solution (to use contemporary U.S. liberal parlance) on the South and followed its victory with the establishment of totalitarian institutions that have forced hundreds of thousands of South Vietnamese into labor camps for reeducation, driven others into the sea and pressed thousands of others into the armies of their perpetual war against the other countries of Southeast Asia. Something like Stalin has led to the liquidation of a nation.

THE ESSENTIAL POLITICAL ACT

The choice of method is the essential political act. It is hardly surprising that rulers who choose coercion as an instrument of government should see violence as a preeminent means of extending their political dominion. Beginning in the late 1960s, for example, Soviet theorists began to identify the armed road, they called it, as the way to power in the western hemisphere. They not only discovered that their own experiences could be applied elsewhere, they set about applying those experiences in this hemisphere.

The Bandera Roja, FSLN, FMLN, ERP and the Monteneros are just a few of the small bands of violent people, technicians in violence and propaganda who found support from the world's greatest totalitarian nation over apparently overwhelming numbers. They begin with terror and seek to inspire fear through the use of terror to gain political ends.

Such deliberate use of terror is relied upon to produce a revolutionary situation. It has become the preferred tactic in contemporary revolutionary conflict. This now-familiar cycle is accompanied by a course of moral outrage from a self-designated constituency of client states linked to the Soviet Union. They seek to win symbolic support for the violence used in the pursuit of total war and absolute power. These technicians in violence and propaganda constitute what are called national liberation movements. The Soviets frankly acknowledge that their support for these movements may be decisive as, for example, when they say, "National liberation struggle is a form of war waged by peoples of colonial and dependent, or formerly colonial, territories, in which socialist countries, like them, become the decisive factor when people launch an armed struggle against internal reactionaries."

"National liberation movements" is the name given to groups supported by the Soviet Union and associated states seeking power by violence. Their acceptance as legitimate by and inside the United Nations is as good an indicator as any of the moral confusion that has come to surround the use of violence, the choice of violence as the method of political action, the preferred method, the instrument of first resort.

LEGITIMATIZING TERRORISM

Inside the United Nations, beginning in the 1970s, successive resolutions passed for more than a decade now in the General Assembly have asserted not only the right, but their support for the right, of the South-West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO), the PLO and other national liberation movements "to struggle by all means, including armed struggle, to achieve power."

Inside the United Nations, the majority, forged in overlapping blocs—many of whose members are Soviet client states—proclaims the right of these national liberation movements to use all means, including violence, and denies that its intended victims and targets have any right to defend themselves.

Abu Ain, accused of planting a bomb in a teeming market area that killed two boys and injured some 30 people, was treated by the General Assembly as a political dissident whose right to dissent and asylum should have been protected by the U.S. courts, whose protection, I may say, he made full use of for a period of years. And the U.S. counsel's decision that Abu Ain be extradited for trial in Israel was denounced by resolution in the General Assembly. When U.S. courts concluded that bombing of civilians was not an offense of a political character, but a political crime, the General Assembly reaffirmed that terrorism in defense of national liberation is no crime—and that the intended victims have no right to self-defense.

In the semantics of the U.N. today, of U.N. majorities today, the distinction between legitimate and illegitimate use of force has not so much been blurred as stood on its head. Where traditionally states are seen as having a monopoly on legitimate use of violence, U.N. majorities today see liberation movements as having a monopoly on the use of legitimate force.

According to this upside-down view of terrorism, violence and self-defense, civilians whose homes and villages are burned, whose crops are destroyed, whose cattle are killed, who are forcibly relocated and whose leaders are murdered are not seen as victims of illegitimate violence, but rather as objects of a national liberation movement. Only governments that seek to repress the violence of national liberation movements are cited for human rights violations. In this view, a society has no right to self-defense against the armed bands in its midst. That is a targeted society.

Thus, the Federal Republic of Germany would have no right to defend itself against the Baader-Meinhof gang. The Italian government would have no right to defend itself against the Red Brigades. The government of Spain would have no right to defend itself against Basque terrorists. The government of El Salvador would have no right to self-defense against guerrillas who boycott its election, attack its co-ops, murder its peasants. The level of confusion has grown very deep and very serious. Yet we know better. We know it cannot be that terror wreaked on a civilian population by a revolutionary movement is liberation, while violence committed by a government responding to a guerrilla threat is repression.

We know it cannot be that national liberation movements have the right to use violence against civilians, economies, societies and governments and that those societies have no right to defend themselves; that violence conducted in the name of revolution is legitimate; that violence used by governments and societies to defend themselves is illegitimate.

SEEING THE DIFFERENCE

The distinction between terror used in defense of societies and terror used to destroy societies is really not so difficult to see. Many, however, have become confused by the semantics of totalitarianism, by the specialists in propaganda as well as in violence. The liberation of Grenada provided, I believe, a particularly clear-cut example of the moral confusion surrounding the legitimate use of force and not only the confusion inside the United Nations. Outside that body, in some allied nations, extraordinary confusion was displayed, as when a distinguished parliamentarian in a friendly government said, "If the governments arrogate to themselves the right to change the government of other sovereign states, there can be no peace in this world in perhaps the most dangerous age which the human race has ever known. It is quite improper for honorable members to condemn as we have the violation of international law by the Soviet Union in its attacks on Czechoslovakia and Afghanistan, if we do not apply the same standards to the attack by the United States on Grenada. . . ."

I suggest that precisely what is at issue is applying the same standards applying them with realism. Inside the United Nations, majorities in both the Security Council and the General Assembly rushed to condemn the acts of collective self-defense that liberated the inhabitants of Grenada from five days of absolute lawlessness in the hands of a group that proclaimed itself not to be a government—precisely boasted of the fact that it was not a government—but a revolutionary group. They were liberated, simply, from five days of lawlessness, murder, from a 24-hour, shoot-on-sight curfew. Participants like Jamaica and Barbados were condemned desipte the clear and present danger to U.S. nationals and to Grenadians and despite the fact that the action was taken at the request of the governor general—a liberation conducted under the collective defense provisions of the treaty of the Organization of the Eastern Caribbean Nations (OECN) and to the manifest delight of the citizens of Grenada.

That the condemnation took place under these circumstances is, I believe, the clearest recent example of the level of moral confusion. Unable to distinguish between force used to protect the innocent and force used to victimize, between force used to liberate and force used to enslave, successive majorities in the United Nations follow the principle of treating legitimacy as a function of will and power exercised on behalf of national liberation movements.

MAINTAINING A SYSTEM OF LIES

There is one last affinity between totalitarianism and terrorism that I would like to mention. Both attempt to confuse as well as to terrorize. Solzhenitsyn, Orwell and others have emphasized that violence is used to maintain a system of lies and that lies are used to justify relations based on violence. Violence can be used to close a society. Lies can be used to veil the violence, to call open that which is closed, true that which is false, insane he who raises questions about anything about which it is not recommended that questions be raised. Violence, as Solzhenitsyn emphasized, is the opposite of peace. It is war. Terrorists and totalitarians alike thrive on falsification and intimidation. Finding the courage to face the truth and speak out about it is surely the first important step toward the defeat of those who would destroy our freedom and our world.●

NATIONAL VETERANS CEMETERY

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation to establish a national veterans cemetery at the currently existing site of the Arizona Veterans Memorial Cemetery in Maricopa County, AZ.

Since 1970, the number of veterans in Arizona has almost doubled, from 250,000 to about 400,000 today. The State's veteran population is expected to double again by the year 2000.

Despite the rapidly growing number of veterans living in Arizona, however, there is no veterans cemetery in the State. In fact, the closest national cemetery with available space is in Riverside, CA—more than 300 miles away—an extremely long distance for families of those buried in a national cemetery to have to travel to visit their loved ones.

The Arizona Veterans Cemetery near Cave Creek in Maricopa County can address this overwhelming need. It is an excellent candidate for inclusion into the national cemetery system. Its terrain suits the requirements of the national cemetery system, and when complete, it will have space for about 500,000 interments.

The creation of a national veterans cemetery in Arizona is long overdue. I invite my colleagues to join me in redressing this important problem.

H.R. 437

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall: (1) Establish a national cemetery in Maricopa County, Arizona, on the site of and coextensive with the cemetery known as the Veterans Memorial Cemetery of Arizona located near Cave Creek Road in such county, and consisting of six hundred and forty acres, more or less, and (2) acquire the land of such Veterans Memorial Cemetery of Arizona by donation, purchase, condemnation, exchange of lands in the United States public domain, or otherwise.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior, in consultation with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, is authorized to transfer to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs such lands in the United States public domain as may be necessary to permit the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to carry out the provisions of the first section of this Act.

SEC. 3. The national cemetery established under authority of this Act shall become part of the national cemetery system and shall be administered in accordance with the provisions of chapter 24 of title 38, United States Code.

SEC. 4. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.●

UNNECESSARY AND UNJUSTIFIED TELEPHONE CHARGES

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to prohibit the Federal Communications Commission from imposing unfair, unnecessary, and unjustified telephone charges on American consumers. In the 98th Congress, the Members of the House passed legislation to prevent just this action, but the measure unfortunately died in the Senate.

Although the charges approved by the FCC in December were significantly less than the original $6 per month proposed 2 years ago, I do not believe that even a $1 fee is justified. These new rate increases are to be levied on all residential and single-line business customers—whether or not they make long-distance calls. In the State of Texas, this will mean an additional $100 million in access charges to be paid by already hard-pressed consumers.

Under the current rate structure, long-distance service providers like AT&T pay the local telephone exchange for access to their network. This enables their customers to make long-distance calls. What the FCC proposal does is shift that rate burden to the local ratepayer, whether he uses the service or not. This is what I strongly object to.

The measure I have introduced has the same end-purpose as the Universal Telephone Service Preservation Act of 1983, to prohibit the FCC from shifting the rate burden to the local customer. I ask my colleagues to join me in supporting this proposal to save ratepayers nationwide hundreds of millions of dollars in unnecessary and unjustified rate increases.●

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on January 11 the Wilmington Chamber of Commerce will hold its 81st annual installation dinner to welcome its new officers and pay tribute to those outgoing officers who made 1984 such a successful year. I would like to pay particular recognition to the chamber's outgoing president, Charles D. Naylor, for a job well done.

A graduate of San Pedro High School and Cal State University Long Beach, Chuck Naylor received his law degree from the University of Santa Clara. Now a Long Beach resident, Chuck has been a member of the Wilmington Chamber for 3 years—2 of which he served on the board of directors.

Under Chuck's guidance, a number of highly successful chamber projects have been accomplished. These include: membership directory—helped develop a successful in-house campaign to publish a listing of the chamber's membership; board of director's retreat—a new program wherein members of the board of directors meet to analyze the chamber's program of work and plan for the upcoming year; welcome to Wilmington sign campaign—a project in cooperation with the Los Angeles City Council and the Port of Los Angeles to install signs at various entrances welcoming visitors to the city of Wilmington; and, small business seminar—a joint project with the San Pedro Peninsula and the Harbor city chambers informing small businessmen and women how to more successfully operate their establishments.

In a nutshell, Mr. Speaker, Chuck Naylor has done a great job as president of the Wilmington Chamber of Commerce and we are indeed grateful for Chuck's tireless efforts and many contributions in making the Harbor area a better place to live and work.

My wife, Lee, joins me in congratulating and commending Chuck Naylor on a fine job and we wish him and his wife, Lynn, and their two daughters, Stacey and Holly, success in all their future endeavors.●

TRIBUTE TO RICHARD WARREN HOLOBER

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege today to acknowledge the accomplishments of a young man who has contributed greatly to the labor movement of my district. Richard Holober, executive secretary of the San Mateo County Central Labor Council, AFL-CIO is moving on to another position of great responsibility and importance in the labor movement. He leaves our area with a distinguished record of accomplishments on behalf of the working men and women of our country. He has been a pivotal figure in many labor activities including voter registration, education and get-out-the-vote drives; the establishment of a Community Service Program for the AFL-CIO in our county; and, perhaps most important, he has contributed to a period of growth within the Central Labor Council at a time when many labor councils experienced losses in membership and enthusiasm.

Richard's involvement with the causes of labor began at an early age as he undertook organizing activities while still a student in college. His concern for the protection of the worker was evidenced by his active participation in organizing campaigns, in lobbying efforts and in innovative problem resolution under his direction. He leaves us now for the Los Angeles and San Diego areas where he will continue an already remarkable career in the advancement of the goals of the AFL-CIO to the benefit of many. We have been enriched by his leadership, and we wish him every success in his future endeavors.●

INTRODUCTION OF NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT ACT

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, today I join with my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLINGER] in introducing the National Development Investment Act and finish-up program for the Appalachian Regional Commission. The bill, which extends and modifies the programs under the Economic Development Administration, and implements the finish-up program proposed by the Appalachian Governors, is identical to H.R. 10 as passed by the House in the 98th Congress.

This is the third consecutive Congress in which we have introduced this legislation. H.R. 6100 passed the House by a strong bipartisan vote of 281 to 95 in the 97th Congress, and by 306 to 113 in the 98th. Unfortunately, the Senate has never acted on the bill; however, we hope that they will take action on it in this Congress.

We introduce the bill today to emphasize the concern of the Public Works and Transportation Subcommittee on Economic Development for those areas of the country, such as my own district in northeastern Minnesota, which have not benefited from the current economic recovery, and will need continued assistance as they try to diversify their economies and rejoin the Nation's economic mainstream.

This is not a jobs bill. It is not a short-term or miracle cure for these areas. It is a program for stable, long-term sustained economic growth and permanent, private sector job creation in the Nation's most economically distressed areas.

It will lay the groundwork for economic recovery at the local level. Our country's economic strength has always been measured by the soundness of the sum of its parts. This bill addresses the most distressed of those parts, our hardest-pressed communities.

Title I of this bill, the National Development Investment Act, would establish a successor agency to the Economic Development Administration [EDA]. The programs are similar to those under EDA: grants for public capital facilities, loans to small businesses, and technical assistance and planning grants. EDA-eligible recipients: States, economic development districts, units of local government, and Indian tribes, would remain eligible for assistance under the new act. In addition, the new bill also would reach, for the first time, pockets of distress in otherwise prosperous areas.

But we have made changes in EDA's current programs to meet the challenges of the 1980's, and to institute improvements based on our quarter century of experience writing economic development legislation.

First, we tightened the eligibility requirements. By limiting eligibility to areas with unemployment rates 1 percent or more above the national level over the past 2 years, and to areas with a per capita income of 80 percent or less of the national average, we were able to confine eligibility to truly distressed areas.

Of course, areas whose major employer has closed or is about to close its doors, or which are stricken with other sudden and severe economic dislocations, would remain eligible.

We also changed eligibility procedures. Previously, once an area was designated as distressed, it remained eligible. Under the new legislation, an area must demonstrate distress with every application.

Third, we adapted the application procedures to reflect the real process of economic development. Applicants must, prior to receiving a grant, draw up a comprehensive development investment strategy into which the applied-for project must fit. Gone is the projects-for-projects-sake approach of the past. Each project would, under our legislation, have to be integrally linked to the area's overall economic problems, and contribute to a comprehensive solution to those problems.

Under the new bill, the Federal matching share would be limited to 50 percent of the project cost, and there would have to be major involvement by the private sector.

The bill includes grants for revolving loan funds, to be administered locally, to make loans to small businesses.

Grants would be limited to $2 million per year for each applicant, with a $1 million per application limit for revolving loan funds.

Our legislation authorizes $425 million a year for development facilities grants, and $75 million a year for planning. It is a 3-year bill.

Title II would put into legislative language the finish-up program proposed by the Appalachian Governors for the Appalachian Regional Commission. Then ARC Chairman Gov. John Y. Brown of Kentucky testified to the need for this finish-up program at our hearings in Huntington, WV. This is a modest and pragmatic plan of action to sustain economic recovery in a major region of America which, like northeastern Minnesota, has not kept pace with the progress of other parts of this country.

The bill provides a 3- to 5-year finish-up for the nonhighway programs of ARC with declining authorizations; $83 million annually for 1985 through 1987; $79 million for 1988 and 1989, and $75 million for 1990. It reduces the maximum nonhighway grant from 80 to 50 percent.

Under the highway program, the bill directs funding to the priority highway routes and accelerates construction of the Appalachian highway system to be completed by 1992. We authorize $234 million for the first year of the highway program.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation focuses on the economic development needs of the 1980's: On private sector jobs; on small business, which studies have shown to be the major source of jobs; and on repair and rehabilitation of the Nation's deteriorating infrastructure, as well as on construction of new buildings, facilities, and other public capital, that may be required.

It is a good bill, a sound bill, and a needed bill that concentrates assistance to the economic problems of those remaining distressed areas of the country which genuinely need outside assistance.

I would like to add here a brief summary of the bill.

THE NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT ACT—HOW THE PROGRAM WILL WORK ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA

Three distress criteria to determine eligibility:

(1) Unemployment: 1 percent above the national average, previous 24 months.

(2) Per capita income: 80 percent of national average, using latest available statistics.

(3) Anticipated sudden rise in unemployment: imminent plant closing, military base loss, etc.

Only one of the above required to qualify.

Eligibility and grandfathering in current EDA law repealed.

DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT STRATEGY

Cities and counties under 50,000: work with Economic Development District or state economic development agency to devise investment strategy.

Cities and counties over 50,000 or pockets of distress within city: do their own planning.

Strategy, in 20 pages or less, includes:

Inventory of community's resources, industries, businesses;
Infrastructure available and needed;
Workforce: skills available;
Land availability;
A showing that nonfederal 50 percent matching funds are available;
A showing that private section is willing to invest;
Description of industry/business to be created or expanded;
Description of specific ventures to be funded, e.g.:
Revolving loan fund;
Employee Stock Ownership Plan;
Grant for infrastructure.

FUNDING

Strategy Implementation: authorizes $425 million annually for 3 fiscal years.
Planning and Strategy Development: authorizes $75 million annually for 3 fiscal years.
These are grant, not loan, funds.

APPLICATION PROCEDURE

Submitted to Secretary of Commerce.
Secretary reviews application to determine that: it meets distress criteria; the strategy, has a good chance of working.
Secretary approves/rejects project.
Best strategies are to be approved—those with best chance for success.

LIMITATIONS

A $2 million limit on federal funds per strategy: Revolving Loan Fund limited to $1 million.
Subsequent applications must requalify on new showing of distress. ●

REPEAL THE METRIC CONVERSION ACT OF 1975

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing legislation to repeal the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 and put to rest, once and for all, the uncertainty about Federal policy with respect to metric conversion.

The prospect of conversion to the metric system set off furious debate in Congress back in the 1970's, culminating in the passage of the 1975 law. Far from mandating conversion, however, the act set no timetable for conversion and stressed that conversion was to be completely voluntary. In fact, Congress has never authorized nor endorsed full conversion of our economy to the metric system. The 1975 act was simply a reaffirmation of existing policy established as far back as 1866—that permits use of either our customary American system of weights and measures or the metric system.

Yet, it was no wonder that our citizens were confused by the 1975 law. Almost immediately after it was passed, Federal agencies seized it as a justification for initiating conversion activities. They provoked widespread public opposition by trying to convert highway signs, weather reporting, beverage containers, school materials, and so on to metric units.

The fact is that the great majority of Americans, without question, oppose conversion to the metric system. A 1977 Gallup poll, the last poll taken on this issue according to the Congressional Research Service, revealed that less than a quarter of the American people favored conversion.

When the Federal Highway Administration [FHA] proposed conversion of highway speed signs to metric in 1977, public comment was extensive—98 percent opposed the scheme—and the FHA was forced to back down.

When the Meat and Poultry Division of the Department of Agriculture proposed meat and poultry sales in metric, 75 percent of public comment was opposed.

Metric proponents have somehow failed to grasp the depth of this opposition to metric conversion and have continued to plod on.

Just last year, we were told we needed a $500,000 study of metric use and conversion. Never mind that in 1978, the General Accounting Office [GAO] concluded the most complete and objective analysis of metric use and conversion ever undertaken in this country, and found that the American people stand to gain little on account of conversion but, in fact, would be forced to bear the multibillion-dollar price tag of conversion. Think of it—every map would have to be rewritten, every tool replaced, machinery modified, workers retrained, scales reworked, highway speed signs replaced, thermometers and thermostats changed, all laws, ordinances, and regulations rewritten, and on and on.

The biggest losers of all would be American consumers who would not only be made to suffer inconvenience, but also the enormous expense of converting products to metric passed on by producers in the form of higher prices.

The notion that the United States is losing exports to metric countries because its products are not designed and manufactured in metric units is even ill-founded according to a 1971 Commerce Department report.

That is as true today as it was in 1971. If there is even a potential for billions of dollars worth of export sales abroad, U.S. firms would surely make the necessary conversion long before the Federal Government mandated it.

They have been trading for centuries with merchants in countries that use different measurement systems, speak different languages, and have different laws and requirements that must be complied with. Nevertheless, they have become the most successful and technically advanced in the world.

By contrast, the 95 percent of the world which has gone metric according to metric proponents, includes countries like Haiti, which has a literacy rate of 22 percent and a per capita annual income of $260; Bolivia with a literacy rate of 50 percent and a per capita yearly income of $477; and Zaire with a 30-percent literacy rate and a per capita income of $127.

Obviously, metric use is not the criteria for judging a successful economy.

The conclusion of the 1971 Commerce Department report—that the notion that American firms are losing markets on account of use of customary units is ill-founded—was reiterated several years later in the GAO's 1978 report. The GAO found that fully 80 percent of the largest U.S. industrial businesses—the Fortune 500—did not expect any significant change in exports or imports as a result of metric conversion.

The finding was also confirmed in a 1984 report by the American National Metric Council [ANMC]. The ANMC found that a mere 16 percent of the Fortune 1000 industrial firms felt that they experienced a loss in sales because their products were not in metric measurements. Apparently, 84 percent—a larger margin than in the GAO's 1978 survey—did not feel there was any detrimental effect on trade as a result of the use of customary weights and measures, or were simply unsure of any effect.

Let me make it clear that I do not oppose use of the metric system. Those who wish to use it or stand to benefit from conversion may legally convert and should do so. However, I strongly oppose Government's unwarranted promotion and costly imposition of metric on the American people who overwhelmingly oppose conversion.

Other countries which have tried to convert to metric have also faced stiff opposition from their citizens. When faced with conversion by decree, Canadians, for example, balked and are still resisting mandatory conversion even though the program is 12 years old. Metric remains foreign to the Canadian on the street. They would no doubt welcome a return to gallons, miles, inches, pounds, and especially Fahrenheit.

During the 97th Congress, funding for the U.S. metric board was eliminated in an effort to cut down on unneeded bureaucracy and return its responsibilities to the more capable private sector. However, while no longer receiving funds, the board is still authorized under the 1975 law and metric activities continue to be pursued by other offices at the Commerce Department as a result of it.

I therefore urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation to repeal the misleading 1975 law and set forth a clear policy on weights and measures in the United States.

The bill follows:

H.R. 436

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Metric Conversion Repeal Act of 1985".

FINDINGS AND POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the majority of the American people do not favor conversion from customary United States weights and measures to the metric system, despite United States involvement as an original signatory party to the 1875 Convention—Weights and Measures (20 Stat. 709), and the fact that voluntary use of metric measurement standards in the United States has been authorized by law since 1866 (Act of July 28, 1866; 14 Stat. 339);

(2) the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 (15 U.S.C. 205a et seq.) has conveyed to the American public and to the business community the erroneous impression that United States conversion to the metric system is national policy, which it is not;

(3) the United States Metric Board, created by the Metric Conversion Act of 1975, is an unnecessary promotional vehicle within the Federal Government, authorized to use the resources and power of the Government to influence and encourage conversion to the metric system throughout the United States in violation of the intent of Congress;

(4) Federal bureaucratic imposition of metric conversion has been fostered by the United States Metric Board's ad hoc Interagency Committee on Metric Policy (ICMP), which has promulgated Federal metric policy and guidelines (Federal Register, January 8, 1980), instructing all Federal agencies to implement increasing metric usage through Government procurement, contracting, and other policy initiatives in violation of the intent of Congress;

(5) several Federal departments and agencies have provoked widespread public opposition by attempting to impose use of metric measurement on highway signs, in weather reporting, in marketing beverages and other products, through school curriculum materials, and through internal departmental or agency guidelines, also not in keeping with the intent of Congress that use of metric measurement by any sector in the United States be strictly voluntary, as provided under the 1866 statute, and not imposed by the Federal Government;

(6) according to an exhaustive study by the Comptroller General of the United States, the cost and disruption of metric conversion to the American people would be enormous, while the purported benefits of such conversion are nonexistent or questionable in practically every area;

(7) there is no evidence that a soley metric system would be better for the United States economy, and United States economic activity and world trade have not been hampered or injured by a dual system of customary and metric measurement according to the Comptroller General's report;

(8) standardization and rationalization of measurements, and other purported benefits ascribed to metric measurement, have occurred throughout the world under the customary system without metric conversion;

(9) the United States Metric Board has failed to assist the public to become familiar with the meaning and applicability of metric measures in daily life, and has failed to coordinate metric conversion initiated in the private sector involving private industry and the Federal Government, two of its three responsibilities required by law;

(10) it is in the interests of the United States to eliminate Federal Government entities or programs, such as those continuing and expanding beyond the intent of Congress under the Metric Conversion Act of 1975, when it is clear that such entities or programs are detrimental or unnecessary to public need; and

(11) voluntary conversion to metric measurements, if desired by private industry, can be adequately assisted by privately funded organizations such as the American National Metric Council (ANMC).

(b) The Congress declares that it is the policy of the United States—

(1) to continue a dual system of customary and metric measurement in the United States, as dictated by the needs and desires of the private sector, and to end Federal Government promotion or imposition of metric conversion;

(2) to pursue a vigorous effort to avoid wherever possible undue or harmful socioeconomic effect of Federal Government programs or actions, such as those needlessly imposed by efforts being advanced under the Metric Conversion Act of 1975; and

(3) to eliminate Federal Government entities or programs that would cause undue socioeconomic effects, or whose existence or objectives are not supported or needed by the American people.

REPEAL OF METRIC CONVERSION

SEC. 3. The Metric Conversion Act of 1975 (15 U.S.C. 205a et seq.) is repealed.●

STATUS OF U.S. POSSESSIONS AND TERRITORIES

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, I rise at the outset of this the 99th Congress to bring to the attention of fellow Members the responsibilities inherent in the U.S. ownership of several islands in both the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean. Under the Constitution, Congress has supreme power over the destiny of these possessions. Unlike the States, the U.S. possessions have no protected status beyond the will of this body.

Today I have introduced two pieces of legislation intended as part of what has been a long process of carving out a status for possessions and territories within the American system. One relates to the right of four of the territories to participate in a fundamental practice of members of the U.S. family, the right to vote for the President. The second item grants a facet of home rule to the people of the U.S. Virgin Islands heretofore withheld: the power to exercise initiative, referendum and recall with regard to local political affairs.

But my goal is more comprehensive. I intend to bring to the attention of my colleagues the need for Congress to focus on a policy toward its possessions. I speak of conscientious decisionmaking and of consistency. For the past several years I have fought to preserve economic incentives and other Federal programs designed to help the Virgin Islands and other possessions achieve economic health and greater self-sufficiency. What is disturbing is that review of these programs appears to stem from a lack of clarity with regard to the status of possessions within the Federal system. Why, it is asked, should we do this for "them"?

I view this trend as born of ambiguity. The approach to territorial matters has been ad hoc, resulting in an increasingly painful vacuum in territorial policy.

I ask my colleagues to focus attention on these concerns in the 99th Congress. The issue is basic and has been set aside for too long: what meaningful policy will apply to the U.S. possessions? Recent attempts to identify the status of the possessions are only heightened now by a growing frustration with regard to the imprecise nature of their position with the Federal structure.●

STAR WARS—THE PURSUIT OF AN IMPOSSIBLE DEFENSE

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues several articles which question the wisdom of the President's dangerous and expensive Star Wars Program.

Howard Ris, executive director of the Union of Concerned Scientists, Tom Wicker of the New York Times, former Defense Secretary Harold Brown, and Philip Geyelin of the Washington Post all concluded that the Star Wars Program simply will not work.

The President would be well advised to scrap his Star Wars plan and, instead, seek an agreement with the Soviets to avoid an arms race in space.

[From the New York Times, Nov. 30, 1984]

NEGOTIATE A BAN ON SPACE WEAPONS

(By Howard Ris)

CAMBRIDGE, MA—Though arms control talks with the Soviet Union are scheduled for January, the Administration's sudden interest in restraining the arms race will not easily translate into a good treaty. If President Reagan wants to achieve a lasting arms accord, he should begin where both countries left off—with space weapons—and he must start with a cogent negotiating strategy.

The failed attempt to reach a negotiating agenda last summer revealed issues at the core of superpower tensions: antisatellite weapons and their link to a "star wars" defense against missiles, and the suspended talks on offensive nuclear weapons. Moscow sought to restrict negotiations to the first; America insisted on both issues. It was also apparent that the Administration was divided on negotiating strategy. Any hope for détente on space weapons rests with an understanding of the threats these armaments pose for American security and how negotiations can diminish such threats.

Antisatellite weapons may destroy satellites used for early warning of attack, for communications and other missions vital to American (and Soviet) security. An arms race in space is probably more dangerous to America, since we rely more on satellites than do the Russians. Such a rivalry opens a new arena of provocation that heightens the probability of nuclear war. Control of space weapons, then, is eminently prudent.

What would a coherent, self-interest American strategy be? Four points are crucial.

First, talks should aim at banning the testing and use of space weapons. A ban on tests would achieve the central goal of preventing development of reliable, advanced antisatellite weapons, and could be verified with high confidence. A ban on possession of these weapons is unnecessary; while desirable, such a ban would pose verification difficulties and be much more difficult to achieve.

Second, a moratorium on testing should precede talks. This should not be a great obstacle. Moscow has observed a self-imposed ban since August 1983; Congress has stopped the testing of America's prototype until March 1985. The President's argument that testing is necessary to catch up with Soviet capabilities is unconvincing. Our antisatellite weapon, though not yet operational, is more sophisticated than the one Moscow has tested with mixed success over the last 15 years. America already has demonstrated a de facto antisatellite capability with the test, last June, of an antimissile interceptor in the Pacific. If our testing proceeds, Moscow will find itself well behind, with little incentive to accede to restrictions.

Third, an agreement should apply both to low-orbit and more-advanced high-orbit antisatellite weapons. Last summer, some American officials said a ban on high-orbit weapons should be our sole objective, since high-orbit satellites are more important to national security and are beyond the reach of current antisatellite weapons. But this invulnerability would erode if development and testing of low-orbit weapons were permitted. In particular, star wars "beam" weapons, while unlikely to succeed as a shield against missile attacks, could well be effective against satellites. Once perfected for use against low-altitude targets, such weapons could threaten high-orbit satellites without further testing.

Finally, there is strong logic to conducting parallel negotiations on nuclear-missile forces and space weapons. The Administration cannot expect Moscow to agree to new limits on offensive missiles so long as America proceeds with an ambitious program to develop space-based missile defenses. The Russians would want more, not fewer, offensive weapons to counter our defenses.

The star wars program, then, presents an obstacle to control of antisatellite weapons and nuclear arms. Pressing ahead with this program would not only foreclose effective restrictions on antisatellite weapons but would prevent serious negotiations on limiting nuclear missiles. This underscores the Administration's need to resolve the sharp dispute between officials who wish to put star wars on the bargaining table and those determined to proceed with the development of space defenses even at the cost of wrecking prospects for arms control.

STAR WARS WON'T FLY

(By Tom Wicker)

Even in the face of the deficit crisis and the forthcoming Shultz-Gromyko talks aimed at reopening arms control negotiations, the Reagan Administration aims to pursue at staggering cost its destabilizing and unrealistic "Strategic Defense Initiative"—the so-called "Star Wars" defense against ballistic missiles.

A new White House statement claims that the initiative may enable the U.S. and the Soviet Union to "agree to very deep reductions, and perhaps someday even the elimination, of offensive nuclear arms." This document disputed, but offered no evidence to refute, an article in the current issue of Foreign Affairs that asserts just the opposite:

That Star Wars cannot work, as President Reagan has said he hopes it will, to make nuclear weapons "impotent and obsolete."

That attempts to develop this defensive system will stimulate, not curtail, Soviet efforts to improve both offensive and defensive capabilities.

That "deep reductions" or any Soviet-American arms control agreement will thus be made less likely.

The article's bipartisan authors—Robert S. McNamara, Gerard Smith, McGeorge Bundy and George F. Kennan—make their point bluntly: "It is possible to reach good [arms control] agreements, or possible to insist on the Stars Wars program as it stands, but wholly impossible to do both."

These four experienced counselors to Presidents back to Harry S. Truman express a generous confidence that if Mr. Reagan "comes to understand that he must choose between the two, he will choose the pursuit of agreement." If he does not, however, they say just as bluntly: "The inescapable reality is that there is literally no hope that Star Wars can make nuclear weapons obsolete."

This conclusion, shared by most scientists and even by Pentagon experts, is based primarily on the facts that nuclear weapons are so destructive and each side has so many—about 10,000 strategic warheads apiece. Therefore, even if Star Wars proves 95 percent effective, which is unlikely, the missiles that still would penetrate it "would be hideously too many," and would result in the "distintegration" of any society thus attacked.

The destructiveness of nuclear weapons is also why U.S. development of even a partly effective Star Wars defense would force the "most energetic Soviet efforts" to overcome it with more and better missiles, more powerful warheads. Neither superpower could afford to let the other develop a defense that would limit the effectiveness of its nuclear arsenal.

Richard Nixon, quoted in a footnote, makes the point with striking clarity: "Such systems would be destabilizing if they provided a shield so that you could use the sword."

That is also why the authors say that a more limited rationale for Star Wars—that it might somehow restrain the arms race while protecting some of our weapons—makes little sense. Against the still more limited reasoning that Star Wars at least would prevent a Soviet first strike, they point out that Mr. Reagan's own Scowcroft commission concluded that the Russians don't have first-strike capability and can't get it, owing to the certainty of U.S. retaliation.

What of the argument, advanced by the President in his second debate with Walter Mondale, that he would turn Star Wars technology over to the Kremlin? That would have meaning only if he could give it "a single magic formula that would make each side durably vulnerable." But he can't, and what he might be able to provide would enable Moscow to improve its ability to penetrate the imperfect U.S. shield.

Star Wars almost certainly would abrogate the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty. The system could never be tested against the ultimate threat—a full-scale nuclear attack—and would have to work the first time it was used. Given likely technological improvements, by the time it could be deployed in the 1990's, there might be less than 60 seconds from the time of a Soviet missile launch for "detection, decision, aim, attack and kill."

Nor does Star Wars promise defense against low-flying cruise missiles, which both sides are racing to deploy, against the manned aircraft, or against smuggled warheads—the terrorist sailing into New York harbor with a nuclear bomb in his luggage.

This overwhelming case against Star Wars evoked in the White House statement the claim that research on the project is a hedge against a Soviet "breakout" in missile defenses. True, but is a $26 billion, five-year program necessary for such a limited objective?

"Something on the order of $10 billion" would make some sense, Mr. McNamara said in a news conference. But no one at the White House seems to be listening.

EX-DEFENSE CHIEF CALLS "STAR WARS" UNREALISTIC

(By Don Oberdorfer)

Former defense secretary Harold Brown said yesterday that there is "no realistic prospect" that a "Star Wars" defense program could protect the U.S. population against all-out nuclear attack, even at a cost of $1 trillion. He called on President Reagan to give up on the ambitious and far-reaching space project.

Brown, who has dealt with space weaponry for more than 30 years as a physicist and government official, also estimated the costs, risks and feasibility of a full U.S. defense and two less ambitious strategic defense plans being considered in the executive branch as alternatives.

He complained of lack of clarity in the governmental and public debate about the Strategic Defense Initiative, dubbed "Star Wars," unveiled by Reagan in March 1983.

The major alternative plans, described by Brown in a paper for the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, where he is chairman of the Foreign Policy Institute, are:

A full-scale U.S. defense against nuclear attack, to replace the postwar reliance on "deterrence"—the threat of nuclear retaliation—as the basis for national security.

"Technology does not offer even a reasonable prospect of a successful population defense," he said. As one of several examples, he said the intensity of laser beams needed to attack enemy missiles early in flight would have to be "perhaps a million or more times greater than anything that has been achieved," in view of potential improvements to the missile systems.

A complete antiballistic missile defense, together with conventional air defense and civil defense necessary to make it airtight, "could approach a trillion dollars" in cost if practical, Brown said. That amount is about 3½ times as large as the current U.S. defense budget.

At a news conference announcing his findings, Brown referred to the full-scale "Star Wars" plan, which has provided most of the political and public support for Reagan's initiative, as "an impossible dream."

A limited program to defend land-based intercontinental ballistic missiles through a terminal defensive system.

The purpose of this would be to "ensure the U.S. strategic retaliatory capacity," he said. This, Brown noted, would mean "not defending people but defending missiles which threaten to destroy people" and thus would be the opposite of what Reagan has been discussing in advocating SDI.

Such a program, according to Brown, is "feasible with known technology" at a cost of $10 billion or more.

This program, like the others he laid out, would require U.S. abrogation of the 1972 ABM treaty with the Soviet Union. Brown said that no existing Soviet threat requires such a major defense of the U.S. retaliatory capability and that such a threat "is not likely to arise during this century if the U.S. pursues a strategic modernization program, generally along the lines of current plans."

Brown recommended continuation of "an extensive research, development and study program on antiballistic missiles" centered on protection of U.S. missile strike forces, to keep open the option to proceed later.

A limited defense of cities against such small nuclear attacks as an accidental or unauthorized launch from the Soviet Union or an attack by a country or terrorist group possessing only a few nuclear weapons.

He compared this to the thin nationwide terminal defense system proposed in 1967 by President Lyndon B. Johnson. An alternative could be "a limited space-based system" giving a small degree of protection to the entire country.

Brown described this as a "damage limitation" plan to "hedge against the failure of deterrence." It would not stop a major or concentrated ballistic missile attack and would provide no defense against terrorists or small-country antagonists who smuggle a bomb into the United States or load one into low-flying aircraft.

Such a plan would cost "upwards of $100 billion," according to Brown. He said it "shouldn't proceed" in view of the narrow spectrum of threats it could counter.

A U.S. decision to pursue any of the plans would prompt Soviet countermeasures, Brown said, "certainly an increase in offensive missiles" and probably in bombers, cruise missiles and Soviet defensive programs. The result would be "a substantial competition which would leave both sides at least as insecure as before," he said.

Because large increases in offensive weapons are an answer to defensive improvements, Brown said, "I don't see any chance for an arms control agreement with deep reductions [in offensive weapons] so long as the possibility of a strategic defense deployment is a very active one."

The former defense secretary in the Carter administration expressed understanding of the discomfort felt by Reagan and his predecessors with the strategy of deterring nuclear attacks on the United States through threat of massive retaliation. But he said practicalities leave "no choice."

In recognition of this, he said, Reagan should "reaffirm the current U.S. nuclear strategy." Reagan and other political and military leaders, Brown said, "should publicly acknowledge that there is no realistic prospect for a successful population defense, certainly for many decades and probably never."

FOUR STRIKES AGAINST "STAR WARS"

(By Philip Geyelin)

Galloping out of the prestigious thickets of Foreign Affairs magazine, the Gang of Four has struck again. Their last ride was in pursuit of a U.S. policy of "no first use" of nuclear weapons. Given their identities (McGeorge Bundy, national security adviser to presidents Kennedy and Johnson; George F. Kennan, the celebrated Soviet expert; Robert S. McNamara, the former defense secretary; and Gerald Smith, a veteran arms control negotiator), it stirred a lot of dust, but no change in policy. The Gang members themselves were more than a little ambivalent.

Not so this time. With no ifs or buts they have pretty nearly devastated President Reagan's cherised Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI). Better known as Star Wars, it promises nothing less than an airtight defense against nuclear weapons and an end forever to the threat of nuclear war. The president would make nuclear weapons "impotent and obsolete" by first developing a U.S. defense and then sharing the secrets with the Soviets.

With stunning unanimity, the Gang makes a compelling case that the proposal—now far advanced, with a recommended $26 billion first installment for research and development, a timetable, and Ronald Reagan's name and prestige inextricably tied to it—is a "dream" and an "act of folly" that "cannot be achieved."

There lies the real significance of the latest strike by the Gang of Four. They are not talking about an arguable element of nuclear strategy. Rather, they are attacking a fundamental and revolutionary transformation of nuclear policy with profound implications for the pursuit of nuclear arms control. And they are doing so with arguments readily available to Reagan in early 1983—if he had put the proposition to the same sort of rigorous test by responsible people on his own staff, in the bureaucracy, in the scientific community.

The awful truth—the telling commentary on his presidential style—is that Reagan had no proposal worked out when he first floated the idea almost casually in a speech devoted to other known quantities in his military program. He had only a fatuous, personal vision of a nuclear-free world.

The Gang of Four's denunciation of Star Wars is withering. To work at all, a nuclear-defense system would have to work perfectly: "A very few nuclear weapons, exploding on or near population centers, would be hideously too many." But "not one of Reagan's technical advisers claims that any such level of protection is attainable," including the officer in charge of the program. Thus, "the inescapable reality is that there is literally no hope that Star Wars can make nuclear weapons obsolete."

That being the case, by embarking on the effort with such fanfare the president is guaranteeing a Soviet counter-effort. The net result can only be a "large-scale expansion of both offensive and defensive systems on both sides."

More than enough authorities agree with this assessment to guarantee big trouble when Congress gets down to the business of voting on the huge sums of money the president is seeking—the more so, given the enormous popular appeal of a nuclear-bomb-free world.

But the problem the president has created for himself only begins at home. The SDI is now inescapably an arms control issue with the Soviet Union, certain to be a top priority when Secretary of State George Shultz sits down with Andrei Gromyko next month to talk about how to proceed with the stalled nuclear arms negotiations. "The Soviets will want to stop SDI cold," says one administration arms control expert. But any effort to negotiate away projects still in the stage of research and development raises awesome problems of verification.

The more likely outcome, the Gang of Four and other authorities argue, is the breakdown of the existing antiballistic missile treaty of 1972 and a serious threat to progress on other arms control agreements with the Soviets. "In this real world it is preposterous to suppose that Star Wars can produce anything but the most determined Soviet effort to make it fruitless," the authors conclude. "The only kind of secret" that could be shared with the Soviet Union in the interest of making "each side durably invulnerable [is] one that exists only in Mr. Reagan's mind."

The Gang makes a plea to the president to abandon his dreams in the interest of a serious effort to achieve some progress on arms control in his second term. With a little more careful study, the foursome gently suggests, the president "will learn that it is possible to reach good agreements, or possible to insist on the Star Wars program as it stands, but wholly impossible to do both."

Failing that, the remedy must be found "in a long, hard, damage-limiting effort by Congress" guided by the words of the late Sen. Arthur Vandenberg when he found one or another proposition wanting: "The end is unattainable, the means harebrained, and the cost staggering."●

SELECT COMMITTEE ON CHILDREN, YOUTH, AND FAMILIES

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am joined by 172 of my colleagues, including every member of the select committee, in introducing legislation to reauthorize the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families.

In February 1983, the House of Representatives passed overwhelmingly a resolution to create this special committee. At that time, we enjoyed substantial bipartisan support within this body, as well as from over 150 national and State organizations, and scores of local groups representing the broad range of constituencies.

The provisions of the resolution we are introducing today are identical to those of the resolution which created the select committee in both the 97th and 98th Congresses. Under this resolution, it will continue to be the responsibility of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families: First, to conduct an ongoing comprehensive study and review of the problems of children, youth, and families; second, to study ways to encourage the development of public and private programs and policies to provide opportunities to children and their parents to be productive citizens; and third, to encourage greater coordination of governmental and private programs which address the problems of childhood and adolescence.

Our first 2 years have been especially productive. In addition to holding 25 hearings on issues spanning prevention strategies, crisis intervention, and the economic security of families, we have issued five reports. Our reports describe and analyze the broad demographic and social trends affecting children and families, and the Federal programs available to assist them. Over 300 witnesses from across the Nation have provided testimony to the committee and its three task forces: parents and children, service providers, State and local elected officials, business and labor leaders, church and voluntary sector representatives, and research experts.

In 1983, we built a credible information base, taking a region-by-region snapshot of the social, economic and demographic changes affecting American families today. Building on these early findings, the committee devoted much of its second year to a bipartisan national child care initiative, culminating in a comprehensive report "Families and Child Care: Improving the Options" which contains specific policy recommendations, and which was signed by every member of the committee.

Despite the intense activity and productive work of the past 2 years, our work represents only a very good beginning. We have begun to provide a clear profile of children and families in this country, of how they live and what their major problems are. We have begun to discover the many successful programs communities have developed to mitigate and even prevent troublesome family-related problems. We have become a resource to other committees and congressional offices, by providing credible, clear and crosscutting information, and enhancing, not duplicating, their attention to issues affecting children and families. We have become a resource as well to the public and the administration on these issues.

With this reauthorizing resolution, we have an opportunity to continue our efforts on behalf of America's families and children, and to continue to pursue the substantial task that remains before us.

We urge you to join with us in supporting our resolution to reconstitute the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families.●

THE HEART OF RURAL AMERICA

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, those of us who grew up in small towns know that in each such community there are several people who are at the heart of the life of those towns. These men and women often never hold any official position in town government. They don't always own the local bank or the local grocery store. They are the people, however, who spend a lifetime serving others in the community, whose concern for their fellow citizens helps build the bonds which make life in small towns so special.

Charlotte Harrison Oberg is one such person whose active interest in others and in her community has made life fuller and happier for her neighbors in Crosby, MN, and the surrounding area in Crow Wing County.

For over 40 years, Mrs. Oberg has written a column for the Crosby-Ironton Courier, the weekly newspaper which serves a large part of Crow Wing County. Her columns, written under the pseudonym "Dick", kept readers up to date on the comings and goings of their friends and neighbors. Her columns are an integral part of the memories which those who have lived in Crosby-Ironton carry with them to this day.●

A TRIBUTE TO FRANK GUILLEN ON HIS RETIREMENT

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Mr. Frank Guillen, who has served an unprecedented 30 continuous years as the elected dispatcher of Local 9 of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, AFL-CIO in Wilmington, CA. Mr. Guillen will retire this month after many years of fine service to the members of local 9.

Frank Guillen was born and raised in Gardena, CA and has lived in the area all of his life. He entered the shipbuilding profession during World War II due to the large demand for workers in the defense industry. He started out with the Bethlehem Shipyard on Terminal Island and moved to the Todd Shipyard in Long Beach after the war was over and demand had dropped off at Bethlehem. He worked for numerous maritime businesses before becoming elected to the office of dispatcher of his union for the first time in 1955. He has served continuously in this post with distinction until his retirement this month.

Besides working as the dispatcher, Frank Guillen provided many other invaluable services for the members of the IUMSWA Local 9. He has served on numerous negotiating committees for the union and was the director of the Western Shipbuilding Association for 4 years. He has also served on the Citizens' Advisory Committee for Los Angeles District Attorney John Van De Camp—now attorney general of California—the Harbor Area Maritime Trades Department; and the Catholic Maritime Club board of directors. He has also represented local 9 members in their workmen's compensation claims for the last 25 years free of charge.

My wife Lee and I would like to join Frank's wife Nagdalena, his son Leonard, and all of the members of IUMSWA Local 9 in thanking him for his years of service to the maritime community in the Long Beach-Los Angeles area and wishing him a relaxing and productive retirement.●

THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF HALLMARK CARDS, INC.

HON. ALAN WHEAT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, Hallmark Cards, Inc. will celebrate its 75th anniversary on January 10. I would like to congratulate Mr. Donald J. Hall, Hallmark's chairman of the board, and all the employees at Hallmark on this momentous occasion.

The international headquarters of Hallmark Cards is located in my congressional district in Kansas City, MO. Hallmark Cards is the story of a young man with determination, insight, and commitment to quality. Joyce C. Hall was 18 years old when he arrived in Kansas City with a shoe box of post cards to start a mail-order business distributing cards. Within a year, he and his brother Rollie B. Hall formed Hall Brothers Co. and they soon began manufacturing their own greeting cards.

Today, Hallmark Cards is the undisputed leader in the social expression industry. Hallmark operates production and distribution centers in 15 States and sells its greeting cards and other quality products in more than 100 countries.

The company has the largest creative staff in the industry and has a worldwide reputation for the finest quality products befitting its well-recognized slogan, "When you care enough to send the very best."

The Hallmark 75th anniversary theme is "Commitment to Excellence." The company is always striving for higher standards of excellence, challenging its employees to do their very best. This commitment is shared by Donald J. Hall, who leads the company both in its pioneering of the social expression industry and its recent diversification efforts.

Mr. Speaker, Hallmark Cards, Inc. is to be commended for 75 years of business growth and expansion, for enriching communities through major economic investments, and for its commitment to excellence in all aspects of its operation. I offer my congratulations to Mr. Hall and the entire Hallmark family for 75 years of caring.●

COPPER CONTENT IN 1-CENT PIECE

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to restore 95 percent copper content to the U.S. 1-cent piece. The text of the legislation follows:

H.R. 217

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

CONTENT OF ONE-CENT COIN

SECTION 1. Section 5112(b) of title 31, United States Code, is amended by striking out the sentence beginning "Except as provided under subsection (c) of this section, the one-cent coin" and inserting in lieu thereof "The one-cent coin shall be an alloy of 95 percent copper and 5 percent zinc. The copper portion of the one-cent coin shall be manufactured exclusively from copper mined, smelted and refined within the territory of the United States,".

STATUS OF PREVIOUSLY MINTED ONE-CENT COINS

SEC. 2. In the case of United States one-cent coins minted and issued before the effective date of this Act, the validity of such coins as legal tender for debts, public charges, taxes, and dues shall not be affected by this Act.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 5112(a)(6) of title 31, United States Code, is amended by striking out "except as provided under subsection (c) of this section,".

(b) Section 55112 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by striking out subsection (c), and by redesignating subsections (d), (e), and (f) as subsections (c), (d), and (e), respectively.

(c) Section 5112(e)(6) of title 31, United States Code, is amended by striking out "subsection (d)(1)" and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (c)(1)".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 4. The amendments made by this Act shall take effect 90 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

In 1974, reacting to the rising price of cooper and the potential hoarding of pennies for their copper content, Congress authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to reduce the copper content of the penny on a temporary basis should such action become necessary to assure continued availability of pennies. However, despite Treasury's discretionary authority, which was originally set to expire on December 31, 1977, the 95-percent copper, 5-percent zinc penny was to remain the statutory standard and does to this day (31 U.S.C. 5112).

In 1982, Congress made the Department's discretionary authority permanent. The Department began minting pennies comprised of 97.6 percent zinc and only 2.4 percent copper, citing potential savings because of the price of copper.

At that time, copper had been fluctuating between 70 cents and more than $1 per pound. Zinc, to which the penny was eventually converted, had remained relatively stable in price, around 40 cents a pound.

That situation is beginning to reverse with copper selling at 55 cents to 65 cents per pound with no supply problems, and zinc increasing to over 50 cents per pound.

Returning to the copper penny would not only produce savings to American taxpayer should this trend continue, but, since the legislation stipulates that copper for the penny shall be mined, smelted and refined in the United States, it will also help our Nation's vital copper industry which is in dire straits. In Arizona, which produces up to 65 percent of this Nation's copper, over 12,000 copper workers have lost their jobs—a 50-percent decline from mid-1981 levels. Fifteen of the twenty-five largest copper mines nationwide are closed; 20 other mines are operating below capacity.

Increased copper content in the penny will furthermore help to correct our balance of trade deficit—some 65 percent of the zinc used in this country is imported.

Should the depression in the copper industry continue and force more mine closures—and, mind you, that is not an unrealistic possibility given market conditions—the mines could not be reopened quickly to meet strategic defense needs. Anyone who has ever worked in a copper mine or is familiar with the industry is aware of the great amount of training over years and years which is necessary to work in the mines. Given this reality, the collapse of the industry would surely threaten our national security as well as our economic security.

The copper penny is obviously not, by itself, the answer to the Nation's trade imbalance or the ailing copper industry. Negotiations between the United States and other copper-producing nations are necessary to limit overproduction; we must end the subsidization of foreign copper industries through such institutions as the World Bank and the international monetary fund. We must also take a look at those environmental regulations which impose a competitive disadvantage on our domestic copper industry but produce little, if any, concomitant improvement in the environment.

There is one other point with regard to the current 98 percent zinc penny which I would like to raise, and that is the threat of zinc poisoning should the coin be swallowed.

Researchers at the University of Arizona recently warned of the potential health hazard associated with the zinc penny after an autopsy revealed zinc poisoning of an 11-pound dog after it swallowed only two zinc pennies. Scientists found about 10 times the normal level of zinc in the animal's liver. A professor at the university subsequently warned, "this has added another hazard to kids and animals from swallowing types of things. Parents—and the medical community—would be well off to know about it."

I insert a December 4 article from the Phoenix Gazette detailing the incident in the RECORD at this point:

[From the Phoenix Gazette, December 4, 1984]

ZINC PENNY DANGERS CITED BY RESEARCHERS

TUCSON (UPI)—After studying a dog's death, researchers warned U.S. zinc pennies could cause illness or death if pets or children swallow them.

In October 1982, the Treasury Department cut the cost of minting pennies by switching them to a composition of 98 percent zinc and 2 percent copper. Pennies minted before then were 95 percent copper and 5 percent zinc.

Raymond Reed, professor of veterinary science at the University of Arizona, said an 11-pound dog died recently after two zinc pennies it swallowed became lodged in its body. Dr. T.K. Warfield, a Tucson veterinarian, said the animal suffered liver damage.

"This is the first we've heard of anything like this," George Hunter, assistant director for technology at the U.S. Mint, Washington, D.C., said. "All the literature we have looked at indicates that zinc is only mildly toxic."

Reed agreed with Hunter that the American public is not in danger.

"You can't maintain that this is a population-threatening situation," Reed said. "It's just that this has added another hazard to kids and animals from swallowing types of things. Parents—and the medical community at large—would be well off to know about it."

Results of a University of Arizona autopsy, indicating the dog died of zinc poisoning, were disclosed in today's editions of The Arizona Daily Star.

Dr. Gavin L. Meerdink research scientist at the school's Veterinary Science Department, said 10 times the normal concentration of zinc was found in the dead dog's liver.●

BENEFITS OF HOME OWNERSHIP

HON. BERYL ANTHONY, JR.

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, today my colleagues, Mr. AUCOIN, Mr. CRAIG, LAGOMARSINO, and I are introducing legislation which is designed to assist first-time home buyers accumulate a downpayment for a purchase of a home.

This legislation is virtually identical to a bill I introduced last Congress, H.R. 2916. The measure will establish an Individual Housing Account that will permit first time home buyers in accumulating a downpayment for the purchase of a home. Contributions to the IHA would be deductible up to a limit of $1,000, $2,000 on a joint return, per year. The maximum amount of contributions to the IHA could not exceed $10,000, and all interest would be tax free.

In order to reduce the revenue loss associated with the proposal, all withdrawals from the account would be recaptured as ordinary income at a rate of 10 percent per year for 10 years. It is anticipated that this will help to keep the revenue loss well below $1 billion once the bill is fully in effect.

Mr. Speaker, the opportunity for home ownership has been, and should continue to be, a top national priority. The benefits of home ownership can never be overemphasized. It is our responsibility to take action now to provide a meaningful means of assistance for the millions of Americans who want, but cannot now afford, to purchase a home.

I urge all of my colleagues to support this important proposal. A detailed summary of the bill follows:

(1) Tax deductible contributions up to $1,000 ($2,000 on a joint return) annually could be made to an IHA. This would be available only to first-time home buyers;

(2) The maximum total home purchase contribution cannot exceed $10,000;

(3) Contributions to an IHA can either be in the form of cash, or in the form of stock, bonds, and securities;

(4) Withdrawals from the account for home purchases would be recaptured as ordinary income over a period of 10 years;

(5) A penalty is provided if the funds are not used for home ownership;

(6) Basis in a home purchased with an IHA would be adjusted downward for unrecaptured funds for an IHA;

(7) Except for extraordinary circumstances—divorce, death, et cetera—contributions must be used for a home purchase by the end of the 10th year;

STEVE GLADSTONE

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in south Florida there are many who live with, endure, and even surmount physical handicaps.

What makes Steve Gladstone unique is his refusal to consider himself handicapped. He has not only adjusted to blindness, he has surpassed those with vision.

The following are some excerpts from a story that appeared in the Miami News on November 27, 1984. The reporter was interviewing Steve Gladstone about his acting career and was unaware of his blindness. After spending 2 hours together, he finally told her.

He is inspirational, creative, productive, loving and lovable. Steve is the most unhandicapped person I know.

The excerpts follow:

Gladstone began losing his vision at 17 to retinitis pigmentosa, a degenerative eye disease that has reduced the world around him to "an amorphous haze."

His most familiar stomping ground, obviously, is the home he shares with his wife and son. Wrapping an arm around the dark-haired toddler clutching his knee, Gladstone introduced one of his most creative works: "His name's George. He's 2 and change." Then he turned the child over to his co-producer, Susan, freeing himself to conduct a brief tour.

There's the big screen, a telltale symbol of his job as personnel director for a South Florida home entertainment firm that he joined eight years ago as a salesman. Next to it is a mahogany roll-top desk, "where I do my short stories and poems and all sorts of extemporania."

At the home entertainment firm, Gladstone found job security and the leeway to continue acting. Gladstone, a member of the Screen Actors Guild and the Professional Actors Association of Florida, got into commercials in 1979.

Gladstone prides himself in not holding up a shoot despite his blindness. Susan helps him by reading the script into his tape machine, "and I'll memorize it and bounce it off her." Sometimes, for an audition or commercial, "I'll have to memorize on the spot. I plead for five minutes to have somebody read my lines to me. I memorize it (my role), and then I give it to them."

He doesn't consider his blindness a handicap, so it disturbs him when others do. "Some people in the theatrical industry get turned off when they find out. But the key for me is getting somebody on my side."

Dom DeLuise was one such person. He helped Gladstone map out his steps during the filming of "Hot Stuff." "He was fascinated," Gladstone remembered. He said, "Can you do this? Can you do that?"

Gladstone also has a cheering section at Filmworks, the company that produced several of his commercials and the Firefall video. "His perspective on life and his sense of humor—the combination is extraordinary," director Rebecca Karst said. In the video, filmed on Key Biscayne, "Steve jumped over pieces of wood, he ran through forests . . . Believe me, no one on the set would believe he has any type of handicap at all." Added her partner, Barry Roth: "To consider Steve as handicapped is a joke. He's simply not used enough."

Gladstone's own world, though, is rich and satisfying. With the blindness, he became more introspective. "This is my reality," he said, exaggerating a therapist's tone. "You begin to explore the inner realms of your metaphysical being." Then the funnyman turned contemplative. "I guess there must be some limitations because of my blindness. I just don't know what they are."●

SERIOUS THOUGHTS ON LEADERS WHO LIE

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, the following column written by Arthur Hoppe appeared in the San Francisco Chronicle on November 16, 1984. It is a sad but important commentary which I recommend to my colleagues.

SERIOUS THOUGHTS ON LEADERS WHO LIE

(By Arthur Hoppe)

Our government has been disdainfully brushing aside Nicaragua's claims that we intend to invade that small country at any minute. Such talk, said assistant Secretary of State Langhorne Motley, is but another example of the "sandbag theory" of diverting attention from real problems.

"This began with Fidel Castro," Motley told reporters. "Whenever times were tough in Cuba, they hyped everybody to fill sandbags against the gringo invasion and not worry about the fact that there's no soap in the stores."

I read past that to another item and then came back. But we did invade Cuba. And at least partly because of Castro's sandbag mentality, our forces were roundly defeated at the Bay of Pigs. So much for paranoia.

And not my government tells me that it has no intention of invading Nicaragua. Its unspoken justification is that a mighty nation like ours attacking a poor country like Nicaragua would be unthinkably immoral. Yet, without warning, we rolled over Grenada, an even smaller country even farther away with even fewer Cuban advisors and Soviet arms. How can I believe my government now?

I have no idea whether my leaders intend to invade Nicaragua. I do suspect that if they were actively planning just that, they would deny it. And I know something far worse: I simply don't believe anything my government tells me any more.

Whatever the pronouncement is these days, I assume it to be a lie until proven otherwise. Should one of my leaders tell me he is renouncing worldly wealth and power in order to become a Trappist monk for the good of the country, I would immediately ask myself, "Why is he saying this? How does this serve his self interest? What's he really up to?" And only if I can think of no reasonable alternative to what he has told me, do I even suspect he may be telling the truth.

How very sad this is in a democracy.

I was talking to a young woman I know about this. I was wondering when it was I had lost my innocence. "I know we believed our government during World War II," I said.

She actually gasped. "Did you really!" she said.

But we did, you know. Those were shinning times. The flag flew bravely in the clean, blue sky and we, the good guys, defeated the bad guys to make the world safe for honesty, decency and democracy. Those were the days!

Yes, we believed our leaders then. We believed Roosevelt and Truman and, above all, Ike, and even Kennedy, too, for all his patrician cynicism. But then things began going wrong. Johnson wasn't going to send American boys to fight a war Asian boys should fight themselves. Nixon and Kissinger knew nothing of the bombing of Cambodia. Watergate was only a third-rate burglary.

With each lie, I think the next becomes easier. And I fear that we live in a time when our leaders care very little for the truth of what they say. It is the anticipated effect of what they say that has become all important.

So my leaders now tell me there were no Migs in that shipment after all. But the Nicaraguans have been receiving much "heavy equipment," they say, from the Soviets, indicating they plan to invade neighboring Honduras at any minute.

This statement, say the Nicaraguans, is "so absurd as to be stupid." And how sad it is that I believe their leaders and not my own.

How sad it is that we, so rich and powerful, are trying to win by force and deceit, rather than by example. How sad that we no longer stand in the world's eyes for honesty and decency and democracy the way we believed we did when I was young.

"Did you really!" gasps the young woman. And how very, very sad it is that even the young no longer believe any more.●

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE GEORGE D. AIKEN

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, on this opening day of the 99th Congress it is appropriate to pay tribute to one of the most admired men who ever served in the Nation's Capitol, the late George D. Aiken.

When George Aiken died at age 92 on November 19, America lost a national treasure. Those of us in public service lost the best role model any of us could hope to know. Today, all of us in this Chamber are renewing our commitments to our constituents. We would do well to recall the example he set, and the legacy he left for us.

As a proud Vermonter, I have always liked to think of George Aiken as the essence of my home State. He embodied the good things that make Vermont special; the peace and quiet of the woods and wildflowers, independence in thought and spirit, deep concern for fellow human beings, and the ability to translate that concern to national policy.

In 34 years in the Senate, he earned the deep respect of a succession of Presidents and legislative leaders of both parties. The simple, common sense solutions he provided for seemingly complex issues have had a tremendously positive impact on the modern evolution of our great Nation.

Outside of Vermont, he is perhaps most widely remembered for his ability to cut through the rhetoric and put the major issues in clear perspective. He is the man who suggested, during the height of the Vietnam war, that we declare victory and bring our troops home. He is the man who told Congress when it was time to either impeach Richard Nixon or get off his back.

But his first allegience was always to his constituents, the people of Vermont. After decades in the Senate, he still preferred to be called the Governor, a position he held with great distinction in the 1930's. His legislative accomplishments—REA, food stamps, WIC, the Eastern Wilderness Act, to name a few—have brought about immeasurable improvements in the quality of life in Vermont and other rural areas of the Nation.

In his years in Washington, George Aiken was never afflicted by Potomac Fever. He listed his profession as agriculture rather than politics, even at a time when he astounded his political colleagues with a landslide reelection on a budget of less than $20. He enjoyed feeding the pigeons outside the Capitol, but returned to Vermont as often as possible.

He remained an alert, caring participant in American life until the end. When I last visited with him, on election night, he expressed deep interest and insights regarding the national returns.

George Aiken at times seemed too humble and modest. Vermont and the Nation can be grateful that he found a partner, Lola, who was able to help the Nation to realize the full benefit of his insights and abilities. It is rare for the talents of two people to complement each other so well.

With Lola's help, George Aiken was able to turn modesty into great strength. He understood, perhaps better than any other national leader, that you can get more done by salving the egos of other leaders than by trying to dominate them. George Aiken never hesitated to say what he believed to be right, and in fact rose to prominence by his reputation for challenging the beliefs of entrenched political leaders, including those from his own party. But he never allowed political disputes to become personal disputes.

He had the ability to remain as one of the ordinary citizens of Vermont, while he walked among kings.

By doing so, he epitomized the ideal of public service, and provided inspiration to others who have sought public office. He set the standard by which all Vermont politicans who succeeded him are judged, a standard to which all Americans who enter public service should aspire.

He is, and will be, sorely missed. But his accomplishments and example have provided a great and positive influence on Vermont and the Nation which will remain with us permanently.●

BAN COP KILLER BULLETS—A RESPONSIBLE PROPOSAL

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today, I have been joined by my distinguished colleague from New Jersey, Mr. HUGHES, in reintroducing the Law Enforcement Officers Protection Act, a measure aimed at outlawing armor-piercing cop killer bullets.

The bill we are introducing today is a modified version of the measure reported by the House Judiciary Committee last year. Under the new bill, it would be illegal to manufacture, import, or sell armor-piercing ammunition, except for Government use, testing, research, or export. Armor-piercing ammunition is defined as ammunition that is composed of projectiles made from certain hard metals, including tungsten alloys, steel, iron, brass, bronze, beryllium copper, or uranium.

Some of the other provisions contained in last year's bill (H.R. 6067), such as a slightly broader definition of armor-piercing ammunition and a feature designed to compensate dealers who possess this ammunition, have been dropped in an effort to speed passage of this very important measure. Simply put, this new bill is basically the same as the measure proposed by the administration last year, plus a ban on sale provision.

Further, and most importantly, it would accomplish what I first set out to do some 6 years ago—namely, better police protection, without infringing upon the rights of legitimate gun users.

This legislation has been endorsed by major national law enforcement groups and history indicates that the enactment of a Federal law banning cop killer bullets is the top priority of our Nation's police officers.

The facts surrounding this issue are well known. For the past 6 years I have been joined by many others in arguing that armor-piercing ammunition is not used for any legitimate purpose, but that these awesome projectiles are extremely hazardous to police lives because they can penetrate their bullet resistant vests. Consider, for example, that more than half of our Nation's 570,000 law enforcement officers wear bullet resistant vests for protection. The U.S. Justice Department has estimated that more than 400 police lives have been saved by those vests since they started being worn around 1974. Those same vests, however, are totally useless against the small class of bullets this new bill seeks to ban. As if we need any other reason to ban cop killer bullets, consider that armor-piercing handgun ammunition was originally designed to help police—particularly when shooting at criminals fleeing in automobiles. However, the law enforcement community does not even use these awesome projectiles—because they are simply too dangerous.

Yet, despite this convincing logic, cop killer bullets remain legally available in most States throughout our Nation. The introduction of today's bill is designed to end this problem once and for all.

Let me remind my colleagues that significant progress on this crucial police protection issue was made during the prior Congress. Both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees unanimously approved bills to outlaw this ammunition last year, but movement ultimately stalled due to differences between the bill reported by the House Judiciary Committee and the bill proposed by the administration, which was the same bill approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee. Under the modified version we are introducing today, the only significant difference that remains is the ban on sale provision. Simply stated, there is no argument against a ban on the sale of armor-piercing ammunition. How can we possibly rationalize that we are doing something good to protect police from armor-piercing ammunition if we allow those cop killer bullets already in the marketplace to be sold?

Let me present the most compelling reason I have for supporting a ban on sale. The date was July 18, 1984. The place, a crowded McDonald's restaurant in San Ysidro, CA. A deranged individual, James Huberty, goes berserk and opens fire. During the siege, which lasted 1 hour and 17 minutes, 21 innocent people were killed and many more were wounded. Of the 245 rounds of ammunition fired by Huberty that day, 192 were imported armor-piercing bullets from Czechoslovakia. The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms reports that 30 million rounds of those same Czech armor-piercing bullets were imported into the United States in the mid-1970's. Should we allow whatever remains of those bullets to be sold through local gun shops? Certainly not. The simple fact is a ban on the sale of armor-piercing ammunition places an unfair burden on only one segment of our population—crazed killers like James Huberty.

Let me stress to Members that we are talking about banning only eight existing types of bullets by this bill—all of the handgun variety. It should be noted that the majority of those bullets come from foreign countries. In fact, the U.S. Treasury Department has stated that the armor-piercing ammunition our bill seeks to ban "represents less than 1 percent of all existing types of ammunition."

As most of my colleagues know, I am a 23-year police veteran who was wounded 10 times in the line of duty. I launched this effort to control armor-piercing ammunition in 1979 for one reason and one reason only—to save police lives. I believe this new measure brings us very close to the successful completion of this often frustrating but very worthwhile task, but I pledge to my law enforcement comrades that I will not rest until the job is done and I strongly urge my colleagues to join myself and Mr. Hughes in this vital cause.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert the full text of the Law Enforcement Officers Protection Act of 1985:

H.R. 4

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Law Enforcement Officers Protection Act of 1985".

THE MILK PRODUCERS PROMPT PAYMENT ACT OF 1985

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday January 3, 1985

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to reintroduce the Milk Producers Prompt Payment Act of 1985. This legislation addresses a serious problem in the dairy industry and provides a unique and responsible solution.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation received hearings in the previous Congress and a great deal of consideration. I commend this bill to my colleagues as we develop this legislation in the 99th Congress.

This legislation is designed to provide dairy farmers with a strong measure of security and control over their milk production and it will help protect dairymen from large losses due to dairyhandler bankruptcies or mismanagement. The goal of this legislation is to reduce the amount of exposure currently held by dairymen while still maintaining the integrity of the current system.

This bill has two main provisions: A milk producers trust; and a prompt payment for milk provisions.

The prompt payment provisions of the legislation provide that a milk handler who purchases milk from a producer in a cash sale must provide prompt, next business day payment for that product. I recognize that this provision would complicate the current marketing order system. It is not my intent to further confuse that system. This provision is to attract attention to the need for a close examination of current payment practices. Possible reforms need discussion and study; however, I still strongly support efforts to provide for timely dairy payments.

It is the milk producers trust portion of the legislation that addresses the serious problem of financial exposure in the event of a dairy bankruptcy. The provisions of the milk producers trust are all relatively simple. All milkhandlers, in a cash sale from a producer and all inventories involving that sale, must place all of the funds received in a trust, let me repeat, all of the funds must be placed in a trust on behalf of those dairymen until such time as the dairyman has received payment-in-full for his product.

By way of example, this section would operate in the following manner: When a dairyman delivers 100 dollars' worth of product to a dairy handler and the handler in turn resells the product in whatever form—be it fluid milk, cheese, or other—all proceeds from that sale must be placed in a separate trust to the benefit of the dairyman until he receives payment. So, in my example, when the dairyman delivers 100 dollars' worth of product to their dairy handler and the handler resells that product, receiving $150 for it, all $150 must be placed in the milk producers trust. The dairy must then retain that $150 within the trust until the dairyman has been paid. The dairy will have no direct access to those funds until the dairyman has received his full payment.

I would expect that dairy handlers would establish their trusts for the dairy at local banks. The trust officer would be the dairy's banker and the trust itself could exist in a money market or other interest-bearing account for the benefit of the dairy. The dairy does not lose its existing float on the dairyman's funds while waiting for the establishment of the blend price. The trust becomes part of the regular inventory of the dairy, but not a direct, hands-on-asset of the dairy. In the event of a dairy bankruptcy, these funds have already been set aside for the benefit of the dairyman and not the other creditors of the dairy.

What we have established with the milk producer's dairy trust is a mechanism to reduce the amount of exposure of the dairyman. This trust should also significantly reduce or eliminate bonding and fee requirements of dairyhandlers—thus reducing their cost of business and increasing profits.

These dairy bankruptcies were not, and are not, confined to the State of Pennsylvania. It is a problem that is nationwide. Dairymen suffer severe hardships in the event of bankruptcy, either through mismanagement, a decline in the market, or even theft.

Organizations as diverse as the Pennsylvania Farmers Association, Pennsylvania Farmers Union, and the Pennsylvania State Grange have endorsed the legislation.

I am proud of this bill because it provides a "no cost to the taxpayer" solution to the dairy bankruptcy problem. In my own district the Scheps Cheese Dairy went into bankruptcy. Dairymen were stuck with multi-thousand dollar IOU's when the Scheps Dairy filed for bankruptcy. Had this legislation been in place prior to the Scheps bankruptcy, those individual losses, instead of being in the $20,000 to $30,000 range, would have been significantly lower. The proceeds from the sale of the dairymen's product would have been held in a separate trust for their benefit. In addition, the financial community, because of their increased involvement in the operation of the dairy, would have paid closer attention to the operation of the dairy, would have paid closer attention to the operation and management of Scheps and would not have been able to submit false financial records to obtain loans.

The current bankruptcy system discrimates against the dairymen, leaving them as the least favored, most exposed creditors.

I am confident that this legislation establishes a method and a means to reduce exposure because precedent exists. It establishes a statutory trust that is similar to the Packers and Stockyard Act of 1976 and the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act adopted last year.

I urge my colleagues to join me as a cosponsor.

Thank you Mr. Speaker.●

REGARDING H.R. 5—THE OCEAN AND COASTAL RESOURCES MANAGEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT BLOCK GRANT ACT

HON. WALTER B. JONES

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, today, for the third time in as many Congresses I am introducing a bill to implement a concept known as "Outer Continental Shelf [OCS] Revenue Sharing." The bill which I am introducing is, with but a few modifications, the same bill which was considered and passed by the House during the last Congress. Even the bill number (H.R. 5) has been retained. I would note that both the original bill and a conference committee report were passed by the House during the 98th Congress, by votes of 301 to 93 and 312 to 94, respectively.

The program which is envisioned in this legislation is relatively simple. It is based upon the notion that support for the OCS program is best accomplished by providing coastal States and localities with direct and visible benefits, giving them, if you will, a stake in the game. This approach is applied and is working in conjunction with many other Federal management programs. The bill also applies another popular and proven concept: Investing revenue from development of nonrenewable resources; in this case petroleum resources, into the long-term management of renewable resources; in this case, those of the ocean and coastal environments. The bill, therefore, has a strong and proven conceptual foundation which incorporates cooperation, mutual benefit, and long-term investment and management.

Under the program, States will receive direct payments in the form of block grants. The block grant format was chosen to allow States maximum autonomy in the use of shared receipts, but also to ensure that the funds are targeted to the appropriate range of activities. The States may use the block grant funds for a broad variety of ocean and coastal management activities, but particular emphasis is placed on activities authorized under the Federal Coastal Zone Management Act [CZMA] and activities necessary to manage the effects of coastal energy developments.

The amount available for annual block grants is to be tied directly to the level of Federal OCS leasing receipts, but will never exceed $300 million in a single year. Expenditures may be made only as provided by annual appropriations acts. Grants will be provided to the 30 coastal States, including the States of the Great Lakes region, and to 5 U.S. territories. The size of each grant is determined by a simple, five-part formula which considers leasing activity, OCS petroleum production, coastal energy facilities, shoreline mileage, and coastal population. These factors provide a measure of each State's relative coastal management burden and of each State's role in accommodating energy developments which are in the national interest, including those which serve to enhance the availability of coal and alternative energy sources.

The bill which I am introducing today incorporates two substantive changes from the bill which was passed by the House during the last Congress. First, the National Sea Grant Program is no longer eligible to receive direct financial support from the OCS fund. It was determined that Sea Grant was simply incompatible with the block grant framework, and in fact this change was endorsed by the Sea Grant community. Second, I have deleted a provision addressing certain boundary disputes between the Federal and State Governments. I wish to make clear, however, that this controversy is of continued significance, and will be addressed in either this or another context.

We are all painfully familiar with the problems facing the Federal Offshore Leasing Program. Lawsuits, moratoria, and delays seem to be the rule rather than the exception. For example, in 1983 the Department of the Interior leased 6.5 million OCS acres, but in 1985 the Congress placed a moritorium on 53 million acres; a perfect example of one step forward and two steps backward. The program is not building support among State and local governments, but losing it, and in fact galvanizing the opposition. Last year, for the first time in recent memory, the State of Louisiana filed suit to block an OCS lease sale. Mr. Speaker, Louisiana has traditionally been the staunchest supporter of the Leasing Program. If you will pardon a somewhat hackneyed expression: With friends like these, who needs enemies.

This escalating and hardening opposition to the Leasing Program is costing the Nation dearly. Failure to efficiently develop the energy resources of the OCS affects our ability to provide American citizens with a balanced and dependable energy supply. It also results in a direct loss of Federal revenue. State opposition has a softening influence on industry bidding, and indeed, may entirely eclipse bidding interest on many lease tracts. Additionally, State opposition will often increase development leadtimes, or in severe cases completely preclude development, and thus, delay, reduce, or eliminate Federal Royalty Revenues. Mr. Speaker, these costs are real and they are occurring. The contribution of the OCS to total, U.S. oil production is no higher today than it was in 1970. Additionally, the administration's once rosy projection that the Leasing Program would generate nearly $16 billion in 1985 has been soberingly reduced; the current estimate projects Federal revenues of $7.4 billion in 1985. That $8.6 billion loss would fund this OCS Revenue Sharing Program for nearly 29 years.

I introduce this measure with both anticipation and regret. The anticipation springs from the logic and potential of the idea; regret from the realization that, once again, the administration will recognize neither of these and look only to the short-term bottom line. Over the long run we all lose: Nation and State; businessman and consumer; resident and tourist; Republican and Democrat. We each have a stake in good coastal management. We each have a stake in the Outer Continental Shelf Leasing Program and stable, reliable energy sources. In itself, this OCS Revenue Sharing Program will not protect 1 inch of coastline; neither will it produce one barrel of oil. What it will do, however, is provide a catalyst for both: The financial resources to support State and local management efforts; and the environment of cooperation and mutual benefit which is necessary for the effective conduct of offshore development.

What is proposed by this bill is not particularly novel. It simply makes good sense. Mr. Speaker, after 3 years of advocating this approach we have made tremendous progress. We have the support of State and local governments, the environmental community, the oil and gas industry. We have listened to all sides. We have compromised where possible. We have dug in our heels where necessary. Outside of the Reagan administration, I am aware of no group which is opposed to this concept. I have, in fact, been recently informed that the Heritage Foundation, in its recent publication "Mandate for Leadership II," noted that the administration's opposition to OCS revenue sharing makes little sense.

During those same 3 years, I have not seen a single proposal from the administration in this regard. In the meantime, the OCS Program stumbles and sputters along, losing a friend here, an opportunity there. We have the occasion to act, and I ask again for the support of this body in pursuing this measure. Fairness demands it; progress requires it; responsibility compels it.●

HONORING MR. CHARLES MERKEL, SR.

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I want to take a special occasion to note the heroic actions of Mr. Charles L. Merkel, Sr., of Berlin who last year gave his life in saving the lives of others during a disastrous flood which hit Glencoe, PA.

Mr. Merkel was recently awarded the Carnegie Medal from the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission.

Last August, Mrs. Martha T. Smeak was swept away by flash-flood waters at Wills Creek. Mr. Merkel entered the flooded area and supported Mrs. Smeak as they were carried away by the raging current. Eventually, separated from one another, Mrs. Smeak was washed onto the porch of a nearby house, from which she was safely removed. Mr. Merkel was unfortunately carried a further distance before he submerged and drowned.

I visited the Glencoe area the morning following the flood. Having been involved with a number of floods over the years, the destruction is impossible to describe until seen first hand. The individual acts of valor and self-sacrifice as exhibited by Mr. Merkel are tremendous acts of courage in the face of such personal threat.

Many lines are written and spoken about the future of America, but I rest easy whenever I see individual acts of courage such as taken by Mr. Merkel, because its eloquence says more than any words can about the strength, character, and unselfishness of America and its citizens. Mr. Merkel's actions are in the highest tradition of our great Nation and its citizens.

For the further information of the Members, I have enclosed a copy of an article from the "Somerset Daily American" on December 15, 1984, detailing the award presentation.

[From the Somerset Daily American, Dec. 15, 1984]

FLOOD HERO HONORED WITH CARNEGIE MEDAL

(By John Wislocki)

He gave his life, but his deed lives on.

Charles L. Merkel Sr., who lost his life saving others from the Aug. 14 Glencoe flood, was posthumously awarded the prestigious Carnegie Medal this week.

The medal should reach his widow, Betty E. Merkel, Berlin RD 3, within several weeks, said part of the letter from Robert W. Off, president of the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission.

"We're very proud," said Mrs. Merkel on Friday recalling her late husband, "We suffered a lot with his death."

Merkel called Martha Smeak on Thursday telling her about the award. Smeak was one of a handful of persons Merkel rescued from the floodwaters. The raging torrent killed the father of two sons. His 16-year-old son was with him when he died, his widow said.

"Charles Jr. watched his father drown," she said.

The commission also presented Merkel with a grant of $2,500 as part of the award that recognizes heroism. They were established by industrialist Andrew Carnegie in 1904 following the Harwick mine disaster near Pittsburgh. That mine accident killed 178 men and boys.

Those victims also included an engineer and a miner who attempted a rescue and sparked the birth of the medal. "The tragedy and the sacrifices so moved Mr. Carnegie that he promptly took action on his then-novel ideas of honoring and helping heroes of civilization," a Carnegie Hero Fund brochure noted.

The fund was started with $5 million to recognize those who "are injured or lose their lives in attempting to preserve and rescue their fellows," read a part of the brochure.

The medal Merkel will receive carries the Biblical quotation: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

Merkel, 37, worked as an employee of Northampton Township as part of the county's work release program.

Five people died in the flood. Merkel's body was found about a ¼ mile downstream.

The grant his wife received is not subject to federal income tax.●

WHY NOT A NATIONAL LOTTERY?

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation I proposed in the 98th Congress to study the feasibility of establishing a national lottery to help reduce the staggering Federal deficit.

Seventeen States and the District of Columbia currently raise revenue through lotteries, and voters in four more—California, Missouri, Oregon, and West Virginia—approved lottery initiatives or referendums in the November 6 elections.

State lotteries grossed $5.2 billion in sales in fiscal 1983, a ninefold increase over the past decade.

If the United States were to adopt a national lottery, as much as $50 billion of the Federal deficit could be reduced over a 5-year period. A national lottery would be unlikely to impair the profitability of State lotteries, since the existence of a national lottery would expand interest on the part of the public in lotteries generally.

Public opinion clearly favors a national lottery. This past summer, a Gallup poll commissioned by the magazine Gaming and Wagering Business found that 62 percent of Americans would approve of a national lottery, while only 26 percent would disapprove.

My legislation calls for the establishment of a Government commission to study the feasibility of a national lottery. Part of that study would be an assessment of the impact of a national lottery upon State lotteries. The commission also would look at the operation of lotteries in other countries, such as Spain and France, which have had successful lotteries for years.

The national lottery program in the United States could be administered by an existing Federal agency or by a new lottery commission. Tickets would be purchased from vending machines in local stores and would cost $1 a ticket for a week's participation. Winners would be announced weekly on network television and radio.

A national lottery would draw money away from illegal gambling and reduce funding for organized crime. Some of the dollars now spent in the underground economy would return to the economic mainstream.

Another feature might be a connection with the Kentucky Derby. There might be weekly drawings with an annual Kentucky Derby sweepstakes.

Studies show the average lottery ticket purchaser in my own State of Ohio has an income of over $18,000, so I do not believe a national lottery would place heavy emphasis on participation by the poor.

As the American public demonstrated, lotto mania continues to sweep our country. By passing the National Lottery Commission Act, we can take a novel step toward reducing the Federal deficit and at the same time, give the American public the opportunity to win huge amounts of money.

I ask for the support of my colleagues for this important measure.●

IN MEMORY OF MRS. VIRGINIA LAMPE

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sadness that I tell my colleagues the news of the death last month of one of Virginia's 10th Congressional District's finest Republican and community leaders. Mrs. Virginia Lampe, a resident since 1953 of Arlington, VA, fought a gallant fight against cancer but succumbed on December 14, 1984, at Arlington Hospital. She was a remarkable woman and served her community, State, and Nation for several decades in various Republican Party positions. She was also deeply involved in community activities especially in the field of mental health services.

Dr. Kenneth Haggerty eulogized Ginny Lampe at services at Faith Lutheran Church and I want to share his moving statement and ask that it be inserted at this point in the RECORD. Following his eulogy, I also ask that several newspaper articles about Mrs. Lampe also be printed.

The eulogy and articles follow:

EULOGY IN MEMORY OF MRS. VIRGINIA LAMPE

(By Dr. Kenneth Haggerty)

Ginny Lampe's life was made up of a series of significant victories and I have been accorded the distinct honor of being able to reminisce on these victories with you.

Virginia was born in Brookeville, Md., 56 years ago, the only child of C. Willard and Virginia "Woody" Harvey. Throughout her childhood she was plagued by severe asthma. She was allergic to pollens, foods, fabrics and some things unknown. Through a strong will and determination, she survived many crises during childhood. She cultivated her singing voice while fighting breathing problems and emerged as a performer in her chosen field of study at the American University, where she was a campus leader. In 1952, she was awarded a bachelor's degree in music. Victory number one.

Some time during her senior year at American University, Ginny met a young red-headed guy named Henry who also liked theatre. It isn't recorded how much time they spent discussing Shakespeare or Shubert, but whatever it was they talked about created a sufficient bond. They were married in July of 1953 creating one of the most successful partnerships I have ever known. At the expense of appearing chauvinistic, I catalogue this as victory number two.

In the late 1930s and early 40s, Frank Fay starred in the stage play "Harvey"—a story about a six-foot tall fictional lovable white rabbit named Harvey. Many years before that the German poet Goethe wrote a long poem about a rabbit named Lampe; a poem so widely read that in the German vernacular rabbits are frequently referred to as lampes. It was a remarkable coincidence when some of Henry's family friends in the diplomatic service in Germany received the following announcement:

"Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Announce the Marriage of Virginia Harvey to Henry Lampe."

In the next mail the only logical wedding gift was off to the newlyweds. A porcelain rabbit.

Now we all know about the ability of rabbits to multiply, but not many of us knew that porcelain rabbits multiply, glass rabbits multiply, iron rabbits multiply. Boy! Did they have rabbits. As the years went by, evidence of friends' warm feeling toward Ginny were expressed in rabbits. Traveling friends looked and shopped all over the world. At last count, 700 of them all catalogued. Not surprised at that Ginny.

The Lampes remodeled their home last year enlarging it considerably. The stated reason was a bigger kitchen and family room. The real reason? You guessed it—the rabbits.

Virginia's interest in politics came partly from her family. Her granddad was the first Republican ever elected to the Montgomery County Council. Her dad was a precinct captain for 30 years. Everyone here knows about Virginia Lampe's involvement in the political life of this community, this state, this country. County Board members, members of the General Assembly and the Senate of Virginia, U.S. Senators and Representatives, Governors of Virginia, Presidents of the United States, all were beneficiaries of Ginny's talents, her drive and organizational skills. When her reputation grew she was a much sought after lecturer in campaign schools throughout the country. We could spend the rest of the day talking about Ginny's successes in the political arena. May I mark the political victories as numbers three through 20.

I would like to spend a few minutes talking about Ginny the person. What motivated this wonderful lady to work so hard for causes? (You know Virginia was a "woman involved" long before people started writing slogans about women's involvement. She exercised her rights by being there and performing.)

Ginny believed the quality of life was preeminent. By her efforts she hoped to and indeed did improve the quality of other peoples' lives. Plagued throughout her life by the recurrent asthma and associated health problems, she went about the tasks she saw needed to be done. It might be purely a coincidence, but worth noting, that after many years of involvement with us politicians, she saw the need for improved mental health services.

She waded in with both feet, serving in many capacities on national, state and local levels in the effort to improve mental health services to our brothers and sisters less fortunate than we. She sought to improve the quality of their lives. One small example—Ginny was informed by the mother of a young lady who was institutionalized that her child and others with her were suffering from severely irritated scalps. This mother was bringing shampoo to her child in an effort to help. Others had no one to do the same. Ginny reasoned logically that there must be something wrong with the materials being provided to the patients for hair care. Well, let me tell you, that from that day on Virginia brought up the subject at every meeting or conference she attended, and she brought it up, and she brought it up. Finally someone listened and investigated. The material being provided for hair care in that institution was commercial floor cleanser. Ginny won the shampoo war. The quality of life of people in mental institutions in Virginia today is improved because of Virginia and her compatriots. Mark that victory 21.

Virginia Lampe's greatest victory was won in the last two months. This terrible disease has destroyed her body but it never laid a glove on her spirit. All who touched her or were touched by her during this illness came away better, stronger, more loving individuals.

We all have our private memories of this gallant person. I would like to share one moment. A few days before Virginia's condition slipped into a comotose state, George Johnson and I were visiting her. I happened to mention that she must have been thrilled by the visit of Ruth Gormley Lane who came up from Florida. Ruth being her long time dear friend. Ginny thought for a minute and said with a smile, "Ken, it was a great scene, marvelous therapy (our reunion). Only thing I wasn't too pleased with was my part in the play." Her smile became a broad grin.

Ginny left a wonderful legacy. She died as she lived—a refined, organized and determined lady.

Everyone who has ever lived has at sometime questioned the concept of life after death, heaven, valhalla or whatever you choose to call it. Our doubts should forever be disspelled here today in this place. For if in fact there was not a heaven before, starting at 12:05 a.m. December 14, 1984, one was being organized.

And so we come to a pause in this experience we call life. A pause to say goodbye to a dear friend. Goodby Virginia—but only for a little while.

GOP ACTIVIST VIRGINIA LAMPE DIES AT 56

Virginia H. Lampe, 56, a past president of the Virginia Federation of Republican Women and vice chairman of the Virginia State Board of Mental Health and Mental Retardation, died of cancer Dec. 14 at Arlington Hospital.

Over the past 25 years Mrs. Lampe had held posts in the Republican Party from the precinct level to the national level. She also had been active in many organizations concerned with mental health.

In the mid-1960s, she was the campaign chairman for Kenneth M. Haggerty in his successful bid for a seat on the Arlington County Board. From the late 1960s through 1972, she was campaign chairman for former congressman Joel T. Broyhill, who represented Virginia's 10th District until 1974.

Mrs. Lampe was 10th District Republican chairman, the first woman of either party to chair a congressional district in Virginia.

She also was a member of the Republican State Central Committee and the board of the National Federation of Republican Women.

She was cochairman of the state campaign of Gov. John Dalton and in 1972 she was national executive administrator of volunteers for the Nixon for President committee. She was a member of the Nixon inaugural committees in 1968 and 1972 and a delegate to the GOP national convention in 1976.

This year she was Northern Virginia chairman of Women for Reagan and vice chairman of the Warner for Senate Committee in behalf of Sen. John Warner.

In addition to her work with the Virginia State Board of Mental Health and Mental Retardation, Mrs. Lampe was Virginia cochairman of the First Lady's Project for the Mentally Retarded, a member of the board of the Virginia Mental Health Association, a past chairman of the advisory committee of the Northern Virginia Mental Health Institute, and a member of the Northern Virginia Association of Retarded Citizens.

Mrs. Lampe, a resident of Arlington since 1953, was born in Brookeville, Md. She graduated from American University.

She was a past president of the Service League of Northern Virginia and was a member of the American Association of University Women and Faith Lutheran Church.

Survivors include her husband, Henry O., of Arlington, and her father, C. Willard Harvey of Brookeville.

ARLINGTON GOP ACTIVIST DIES

ARLINGTON.—Virginia H. Lampe, Arlington's first lady of Republican politics for the last several decades, died of cancer early Friday morning at Arlington Hospital. She was 56.

Lampe, a 30-year county resident, was active in numerous local, state and national Republican organizations as well as health, service and other volunteer groups.

She served on a number of statewide Republican committees, including the gubernatorial campaigns of John N. Dalton, Mills E. Godwin and Linwood Holton and the senatorial campaigns and the senate campaigns of John Warner and Paul Trible. Lampe had been a campaign manager for former 10th District Congressman Joel T. Broyhill.

Warner, Broyhill and 10th District Congressman Frank Wolf will serve as pall bearers at Lampe's funeral Monday.

Lampe was actively involved with the National Federation of Republican Women and served as president for the Virginia Federation of Republican women from 1976–1980. She was also active in the presidential campaigns of Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford, serving in the former's 1972 campaign as national administrator of volunteers.

1972, Gerald Ford and Lampe had also served as the 10th District chairwoman of Women for Reagan-Bush during the 1984 campaign.

She also served as a delegate to the Republican National Convention in 1976 and was the first woman of either party to serve as the 10th District chairman. She held that position from 1972–1976.

In addition to her political activities, Lampe participated in a number of local service clubs, serving on the executive board of Central Education Television and on the Service League of Northern Virginia, of which she was a past president.

Virginia Lampe never stopped giving herself to Arlington County. She contributed more of her time and effort to the welfare of the county, as well as to Virginia as a whole, than most people ever hope to. On Friday, after a long bout with cancer, Virginia Lampe, a young 56, died.

There is a lot to say about her, but we will let her family and many friends keep her spirit and goodwill alive. We want to note, nonetheless, that she should be remembered as somebody very special. Not only was she very active in many community organizations, she was also a tireless worker within the Republican Party. She worked for many prominent state and regional Republicans during the 30 years she lived in Arlington. She was the president of Virginia Federation of Republican Women from 1976 to 1980. Despite her partisan work, she was liked and admired by members of both parties.

Virginia Lampe has left her a lasting mark on local and state politics. We are proud to be able to say so.●

INTRODUCTION OF AFRICA FAMINE SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, a child in Chad, sifting through the dirt for a few grains of wheat; groups of Ethiopians wandering through the desolate countryside, family members dying along the way; masses of crippled, diseased, and starving people around the continent. We have all heard and seen the images of the overwhelming tragedy in Africa; we must now immediately take action to reduce its toll.

I strongly believe that increased famine relief and recovery assistance for the drought-ravaged areas of Africa must be an urgent legislative priority in the 99th Congress.

Today Congressmen HOWARD WOLPE, MICKEY LELAND, and I are introducing a supplemental appropriations bill providing more than $1 billion in famine relief and recovery assistance for fiscal year 1985; 68 Members of the House, from both political parties, are original cosponsors. Senator PAUL SIMON, joined by Senators EDWARD M. KENNEDY and JOHN MELCHER, will introduce a similar bill in the Senate.

The appropriations we recommend are based on the best available estimates of the needs in the affected countries. Traditionally, the United States has provided at least half of international food aid in emergencies, and our bill would continue that traditional commitment. We seek to increase funds for the Food for Peace Title II Program by $787 million, providing enough money to purchase and transport 1.7 million metric tons of food. Of the $787 million, $610 million is for food and $177 million is for inland transportation. The bill also includes $4 million for improved planning, monitoring, and supervision of the food aid.

The growing toll of death and starvation in Ethiopia, Chad, Mozambique, Sudan, Mali, and other countries reveals the urgency with which the Congress and the President must approve this additional food aid. The present drought is affecting 150 million people in 28 countries.

Along with the food assistance, the supplemental contains an additional $225 million for projects that promote longer term recovery by the affected countries. The current crisis may be alleviated with food aid alone, but the recurring problem will not be solved unless we begin to look at the historic causes of famine on the continent. It is essential that we link emergency aid to projects that promote a return to normalcy in agricultural production.

The bill's recovery assistance will include:

Eighty million dollars for rehabilitation programs, to be largely implemented by private voluntary organizations to benefit the poorest population groups, such as agricultural development, health, water, forestry, energy renewal, women in development, and food preservation projects.

Seventy million dollars for international disaster assistance, such as emergency medicines, vaccines, oral rehydration therapy, shelter, blankets, well-drilling equipment, seeds, fertilizer, and agricultural tools.

Fifty million dollars for assisting refugees and displaced persons in Africa, with an emphasis on immediate and longer term development projects.

Twenty-five million dollars to assist in overcoming transportation, storage, and logistical problems affecting regular food aid programs for the poorest population groups.

I want to stress that even more funds may be required. Many of the private voluntary organizations working with famine victims in Africa are concerned that the need for nonfood aid may be greater than presently anticipated.

In Ethiopia, for example, UNICEF's emergency operations unit has issued an appeal for 1 million blankets, of which 400,000 have been pledged by Japan and Italy; 40,000 metric tons of seeds, at a cost of $33 million, for spring planting; medical supplies valued at $5.4 million; and emergency shelters, clothing, stoves, and other essential materials at a cost of $5.2 million. In Chad, UNICEF is reporting an urgent need for water supply rehabilitation and well drilling equipment, trucks to transport food supplies, and cattle vaccine.

Several of us in Congress have for nearly 2 years been calling for a greater U.S. response to the African drought. We were pleased that the administration finally began to address the food needs in a serious manner during the past 3 months. But clearly the funds recently committed by the administration indicate a much greater—and as yet unmet—food need for the remainder of this fiscal year.

The American people have responded to recent media coverage of the famine with an outpouring of concern and support. I urge my colleagues in Congress and the President to reflect the humanitarian instincts of the American people and move swiftly to enact this legislation. The text of the legislation follows:

H.R. 100

A CALL TO LIMIT CONGRESSION- AL TERMS IN OFFICE

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment that will reform congressional terms of office. This legislation would limit Senators to two terms of 6 years each; Representatives to three terms of 4 years each. The House would be divided into two classes, each to be elected alternately. I strongly believe that this proposal, and others like it, would help to replace the narrow interests which presently dominate Congress with the general public interest which reflects the better judgment of the American people.

Our Founding Fathers viewed the Congress as a body in which citizen legislators established the laws by which they and their fellow citizens chose to abide. It was not expected that individuals elected to Congress would remain in Washington for years on end; rather, it was felt that service in the Congress would be the same as a duty—not necessarily a pleasant one, but important if the experiment in democracy were to succeed.

We have strayed from this concept. Life as a Congressman has become so attractive that it has become increasingly difficult for us to remember our purpose for being here. Often, longevity in Washington becomes an end in itself. While there may be some justification for the longer periods of service that have become prevalent in this century—due to the increased importance of the committee system and the expanding variety and complexity of legislative issues—it is also true that the perception of Congress as a desirable and attractive permanent career has grown dramatically. Not surprisingly, the American people have, to a large degree, lost faith in the ability and willingness of Congress to represent their general best interest.

Twelve years is time enough for any one of us to make our mark in Washington, to make the kind of contribution to the course of our Nation's affairs that our forefathers intended. Although some contend that a limitation would prematurely end the contributions of a few exceptional legislators—and the roll of those who have been outstanding Members of Congress for 20, 30, and even 40 years includes many of the leading figures in our Nation's history—I nevertheless would argue that my proposal would provide an opportunity for many more outstanding Americans to apply their initiative, leadership, and talents to the benefit of our Nation.

Of course, the most important reason for limiting congressional terms of office is to restore the confidence of the American people in Government. By providing for the regular turnover of congressional membership, we can make a lasting contribution in this area. Members of Congress would be chosen by their fellow citizens to represent them on a temporary basis—and would then return home to pursue their various chosen careers. We are American citizens first, Congressmen second—and the American people have every right to expect that we understand this basic fact.

The public demands, and certainly deserves, an improvement in the quality of work performed by Congress. According to all the surveys of public opinion with which I am familiar, Americans overwhelmingly support the 4-year term. My own constituents continue to voice their concern that Congress is "out of touch" with their problems and needs. They believe that elected officials should serve in Washington for a period long enough to make a contribution, but not for so long that they are forgotten. They fully expect to receive a fair return on their investment. Mr. Speaker, holding elected office in the U.S. Congress should constitute a period of public service, not a career.●

NOT "WORTH," MAYBE, BUT EQUITY

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, the New York Times yesterday published a thoughtful editorial concerning the issue of pay equity. It dispels much of the confusion concerning comparable worth which has been spread by some who oppose eliminating pay discrimination against women. I commend this editorial to my colleagues:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 2, 1985]

NOT "WORTH," MAYBE, BUT EQUITY

There's been a storm of confusion in the last year about something called "comparable worth." That's been the slogan of those who think men and women performing nominally different jobs should receive equal pay if those jobs are of "comparable" value to an employer. The idea has become so controversial that the phrase itself is probably no longer useful.

For some, "comparable worth" conjures up a nightmare, a wholesale reordering of all jobs so that the "worth" of nurses, say, is compared to that of nuclear physicists. Others find the underlying concept more palatable when it's described as "pay equity." What should count underneath the swirl is sex discrimination, the often surprisingly crude and tenacious effort to pay women less than men for similar work.

Normally, pay levels are and should be determined by supply and demand in the job market. But sometimes women have had their wages depressed because the work they do, while truly comparable to that done by men for the same employer, is classified as something else. That is the condition that gave rise to a legal theory of "comparable worth," a measure by which such discrimination might be rooted out.

The theory got its biggest boost in 1983 from Federal Judge Jack Tanner, who concluded that the state of Washington had practiced illegal discrimination by segregating differently paid jobs by sex where sex was not a legitimate qualification. Female dental assistants, for example, were paid 20 percent less than predominantly male X-ray technicians. "Barbers" were paid 5 percent more than "beauticians" by state institutions. Mostly male counselers at correctional institutions were paid 8 percent more than mostly female counselors at mental institutions.

Judge Tanner ruled that sex-based distinctions violated Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which prohibits discrimination in employment and compensation. The ruling, if upheld, could cost Washington $1 billion to equalize pay.

How far to stretch this principle is the issue in a dozen current cases. New York City is the defendant in a suit alleging discrimination as the principal reason why police dispatchers, mostly black and female, are paid $4,000 to $6,000 less than fire dispatchers, overwhelmingly white and male.

Some groups appear intent on applying the "comparable worth" test to any job category filled mostly by women, even where there is no proof of deliberate discrimination. Fearing that kind of broad application, the Reagan Administration opposes the legal concept of comparable worth. But the National Governors Association endorsed the principle of pay equity for public employees at its 1954 annual meeting.

Many state and local governments are finding it easier and cheaper, however, to correct unfair pay schedules through collective bargaining. According to the National Committee on Pay Equity, more than 15 states are now re-evaluating job classifications to see whether they betray discrimination. Deliberate discrimination between men and women by a single employer is impermissible. Rooting it out requires some concept of fairness, call it "pay equity" if not "comparable worth."

But no such theory can overcome the much less deliberate, socially rooted patterns of segregation. A generation ago, for example, because they were mostly barred from many fields, women were much more likely than men to become teachers, nurses or stenographers. The remedy for that kind of segregation is to keep expanding women's opportunities in other lines of work and to let the market determine the "worth" of men and women alike.●

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to extend the provisions of title XII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, relating to war risk insurance, for an additional 5 years, ending September 30, 1989. This title expired on September 30, 1984.

Title XII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, authorizes the Secretary of Transportation, with the approval of the President, to provide war risk and certain marine and liability insurance for protection of vessels, cargoes, and crew life and personal effects when commercial insurance cannot be obtained on reasonable terms and conditions. The purpose of title XII is to maintain the flow of U.S. waterborne commerce, including the maintenance of essential transportation services for the Department of Defense.

War risk insurance was provided by the Government in both World Wars I and II, and proved effective in protecting the civilian and military commerce of the United States, with total premium receipts in excess of losses paid. Title XII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, was enacted at the outbreak of the Korean war in 1950. It was temporary legislation that would expire in 5 years. Congress has continued to extend the life of the title since then.

Government war risk insurance is necessary since commercial war risk insurance policies now in effect contain automatic termination clauses that cause insurance to terminate upon hostile detonation of a nuclear device of war or upon the outbreak of war (whether there is a declaration of war or not) between any of the following countries: United States of America, United Kingdom (or any other member of the British Commonwealth), France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the People's Republic of China. Without government war risk insurance, American vessels would be without protection against loss by risks of war after termination of the commercial policies. Ships and cargoes would not move without adequate insurance coverage.

The Maritime Administration in the Department of Transportation issues, for a fee, binders under which government war risk insurance would attach immediately upon termination of commercial war risk insurance.

These binders give back-to-back coverage with the commercial policies and expire at the end of 30 days. At that time, premiums for the insured period would be fixed retroactively. Contracts for the ensuing period would be determined on the basis of the circumstances existing at that time.

An identical bill, H.R. 5505, was passed by the House on May 15, 1984 by a vote of 413-0. The Senate failed to act on the measure and it died with the adjournment of the 98th Congress.

Since authority for this program has expired, I intend to move expeditiously to insure enactment of the legislation early in this session.●

WE NEED ARMS CONTROL NOT ANOTHER ARMS RACE IN SPACE

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, the 99th Congress opens with a number of issues which need to be addressed. Key among them is the need to reduce nuclear tension in the world through an active pursuit of arms control. In particular, we need to keep weapons out of space as we strive to stop the arms race in strategic offensive nuclear weapons.

That's why the President's Strategic Defense Initiative [SDI], commonly known as Star Wars, received serious attention last year from a number of sources, including the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. The committee's examination of this program will continue in the 99th Congress.

Several highly respected former Government, defense, and arms control officials have lent their names and expertise in opposition to the President's space program. Most recently, McGeorge Bundy, George Kennan, Robert McNamara, and Gerard Smith collaborated on an article in Foreign Affairs magazine—winter 1984/1985—entitled "The President's Choice: Star Wars or Arms Control."

The essence of that article is highlighted in a December 7th column by Philip Geyelin in the Washington Post which follows my remarks. Mr. Geyelin points out that the Bundy/Kennan/McNamara/Smith piece shows how the President's objective of rendering nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete via SDI is impossible. To render these weapons impotent and obsolete, a defensive system would have to work perfectly. According to almost everyone a perfect population defense is impossible. Even Lieutenant General Abrahamson, Director of the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization, agrees that such a perfect defense is impossible.

Moreover, while the administration promotes the idea of a grand defensive system, the Soviets will undoubtedly respond by upgrading their own defensive systems, and also by increasing and improving their offensive systems to overwhelm any kind of defense we can muster. Former Defense Secretary Harold Brown made this point last month in a paper he prepared for the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies—see attached Washington Post article of December 15, 1984, entitled "Ex-Defense Chief Calls 'Star Wars' Unrealistic." Dr. Brown argues that such a dual arms race would result in making us more not less insecure, a conclusion contained in the interim report released by my Subcommittee on International Security and Scientific Affairs on May 18, 1984. The subcommittee report also noted the unacceptable multibillion dollar cost of the Star Wars proposal as well as its adverse impact on our relations with our closest allies in NATO.

The SDI is billed as a program that will result in the reduction of offensive missiles, but in testimony before this committee last Congress, we were told that this is not the case. As long as the SDI is promoted as a viable possibility, the Soviets will have no choice but to upgrade their own defensive and offensive systems leaving little or no possibility for reduction in United States-Soviet offensive arsenals.

President Reagan therefore has to make a choice: Star Wars or arms control. He cannot have both. These arms control experts and many in the Congress would advise the President to make the choice in favor of arms control in space. We must prevent the militarization of space. The world cannot afford two arms races.

The above-mentioned articles follow:

FOUR STRIKES AGAINST "STAR WARS"

(By Philip Geyelin)

Galloping out of the prestigious thickets of Foreign Affairs magazine, the Gang of Four has struck again. Their last ride was in pursuit of a U.S. policy of "no first use" of nuclear weapons. Given their identities (McGeorge Bundy, national security adviser to presidents Kennedy and Johnson; George F. Kennan, the celebrated Soviet expert; Robert S. McNamara, the former defense secretary, and Gerard Smith, a veteran arms control negotiator), it stirred a lot of dust, but no change in policy. The Gang members themselves were more than a little ambivalent.

Not so this time. With no ifs or buts, they have pretty nearly devastated President Reagan's cherished Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI). Better known as Star Wars, it promises nothing less than an airtight defense against nuclear weapons and an end forever to the threat of nuclear war. The president would make nuclear weapons "impotent and obsolete" by first developing a U.S. defense and then sharing the secrets with the Soviets.

With stunning unanimity, the Gang makes a compelling case that the proposal—now far advanced, with a recommended $26 billion first installment for research and development, a timetable, and Ronald Reagan's name and prestige inextricably tied to it—is a "dream" and an "act of folly" that "cannot be achieved."

There lies the real significance of the latest strike by the Gang of Four. They are not talking about an arguable element of nuclear strategy. Rather, they are attacking a fundamental and revolutionary transformation of nuclear policy with profound implications for the pursuit of nuclear arms control. And they are doing so with arguments readily available to Reagan in early 1983—if he had put the proposition to the same sort of rigorous test by responsible people on his own staff, in the bureaucracy, in the scientific community.

The awful truth—the telling commentary on his presidential style—is that Reagan had no proposal worked out when he first floated the idea almost casually in a speech devoted to other, known quantities in his military program. He had only a fatuous, personal vision of a nuclear-free world.

The Gang of Four's denunciation of Star Wars is withering. To work at all, a nuclear-defense system would have to work perfectly: "A very few nuclear weapons, exploding on or near population centers, would be hideously too many." But "not one of Reagan's technical advisers claims that any such level of protection is attainable," including the officer in charge of the program. Thus, "the inescapable reality is that there is literally no hope that Star Wars can make nuclear weapons obsolete."

That being the case by embarking on the effort with such fanfare the president is guaranteeing a Soviet counter-effort. The net result can only be a "large-scale expansion of both offensive and defensive systems on both sides."

More than enough authorities agree with this assessment to guarantee big trouble when Congress gets down to the business of voting on the huge sums of money the president is seeking—the more so, given the enormous popular appeal of a nuclear-bomb-free world.

But the problem the president has created for himself only begins at home. The SDI is now inescapably an arms control issue with the Soviet Union, certain to be a top priority when Secretary of State George Shultz sits down with Andrei Gromyko next month to talk about how to proceed with the stalled nuclear arms negotiations. "The Soviets will want to stop SDI cold," says one administration arms control expert. But any effort to negotiate away projects still in the stage of research and development raises awesome problems of verification.

The more likely outcome, the Gang of Four and other authorities argue, is the breakdown of the existing anti-ballistic missile treaty of 1972 and a serious threat to progress on other arms control agreements with the Soviets. "In this real world it is preposterous to suppose that Star Wars can produce anything but the most determined Soviet effort to make it fruitless," the authors conclude. "The only kind of secret" that could be shared with the Soviet Union in the interest of making "each side durably invulnerable [is] one that exists only in Mr. Reagan's mind."

The Gang makes a plea to the president to abandon his dreams in the interest of a serious effort to achieve some progress on arms control in his second term. With a little more careful study, the foursome gently suggests, the president "will learn that it is possible to reach good agreements, or possible to insist on the Star Wars program as it stands, but wholly impossible to do both."

Failing that, the remedy must be found "in a long, hard, damage-limiting effort by Congress" guided by the words of the late Sen. Arthur Vandenberg when he found one or another proposition wanting: "The end is unattainable, the means harebrained, and the cost staggering."

EX-DEFENSE CHIEF CALLS "STAR WARS" UNREALISTIC

BROWN URGES JUNKING OF DEFENSE PLAN

(By Don Oberdorfer)

Former defense secretary Harold Brown said yesterday that there is "no realistic prospect" that a "Star Wars" defense program could protect the U.S. population against all-out nuclear attack, even at a cost of $1 trillion. He called on President Reagan to give up on the ambitious and far-reaching space project.

Brown, who has dealt with space weaponry for more than 30 years as a physicist and government official, also estimated the costs, risks and feasibility of a full U.S. defense and two less ambitious strategic defense plans being considered in the executive branch as alternatives.

He complained of lack of clarity in the governmental and public debate about the Strategic Defense Initiative, dubbed "Star Wars," unveiled by Reagan in March 1983.

The major alternative plans, described by Brown in a paper for the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, where he is chairman of the Foreign Policy Institute, are:

A full-scale U.S. defense against nuclear attack, to replace the post-war reliance on "deterrence"—the threat of nuclear retaliation—as the basis for national security.

"Technology does not offer even a reasonable prospect of a successful population defense," he said. As one of several examples, he said the intensity of laser beams needed to attack enemy missiles early in flight would have to be "perhaps a million or more times greater than anything that has been achieved," in view of potential improvements to the missile systems.

A complete antiballistic missile defense, together with conventional air defense and civil defense necessary to make it airtight, "could approach a trillion dollars" in cost if practical, Brown said. That amount is about 3½ times as large as the current U.S. defense budget.

At a news conference announcing his findings, Brown referred to the full-scale "Star Wars" plan, which has provided most of the political and public support for Reagan's initiative, as "an impossible dream."

A limited program to defend land-based intercontinental ballistic missiles through a terminal defensive system.

The purpose of this would be to "ensure the U.S. strategic retaliatory capacity," he said. This, Brown noted, would mean "not defending people but defending missiles which threaten to destroy people" and thus would be the opposite of what Reagan has been discussing in advocating SDI.

Such a program, according to Brown, is "feasible with known technology" at a cost of $10 billion or more.

This program, like the others he laid out, would require U.S. abrogation of the 1972 ABM treaty with the Soviet Union. Brown said that no existing Soviet threat requires such a major defense of the U.S. retaliatory capability and that such a threat "is not likely to arise during this century if the U.S. pursues a strategic modernization program, generally along the lines of current plans."

Brown recommended continuation of "an extensive research, development and study program on antiballistic missiles" centered on protection of U.S. missile strike forces, to keep open the option to proceed later.

A limited defense of cities against such small nuclear attacks as an accidental or unauthorized launch from the Soviet Union or an attack by a country or terrorist group possessing only a few nuclear weapons.

He compared this to the thin nationwide terminal defense system proposed in 1967 by President Lyndon B. Johnson. An alternative could be "a limited space-based system" giving a small degree of protection to the entire country.

Brown described this as a "damage limitation" plan to "hedge against the failure of deterrence." It would not stop a major or concentrated ballistic missile attack and would provide no defense against terrorists or small-country antagonists who smuggle a bomb into the United States or load one into low-flying aircraft.

Such a plan would cost "upwards of $100 billion," according to Brown. He said it "shouldn't proceed" in view of the narrow spectrum of threats it could counter.

A U.S. decision to pursue any of the plans would prompt Soviet countermeasures, Brown said, "certainly an increase in offensive missiles" and probably in bombers, cruise missiles and Soviet defensive programs. The result would be "a substantial competition which would leave both sides at least as insecure as before," he said.

Because large increases in offensive weapons are an answer to defensive improvements, Brown said, "I don't see any chance for an arms-control agreement with deep reductions [in offensive weapons] so long as the possibility of a strategic defense deployment is a very active one."

The former defense secretary in the Carter administration expressed understanding of the discomfort felt by Reagan and his predecessors with the strategy of deterring nuclear attacks on the United States through threat of massive retaliation. But he said practicalities leave "no choice."

In recognition of this, he said, Reagan should "reaffirm the current U.S. nuclear strategy." Reagan and other political and military leaders, Brown said, "should publicly acknowledge that there is no realistic prospect for a successful population defense, certainly for many decades and probably never."●

NATIONAL ALOPECIA AREATA AWARENESS WEEK

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday January 3, 1985

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a joint resolution to designate the week beginning July 7, 1985, as "National Alopecia Areata Awareness Week." Alopecia areata is a serious disease which affects approximately 2 million people, particularly children and young adults.

Alopecia areata means "bald spot" in Latin. Alopecia occurs when the hair follicles stop production, causing severe hair loss. It is common for alopecia victims to lose all of their hair, including eyelashes, eyebrows and body hair. The follicles remain below the surface of the skin, and they can resume hair production, but we do not know yet how to trigger growth. Researchers have found evidence that this "hibernation" of the follicles is caused by a problem with body's immune system, and they believe that a cure for alopecia is within reach.

Since alopecia areata has no physically debilitating effects, it is hard for most of us to understand just how devastating the disease can be. Most alopecia victims hide their condition from friends and even family members, living in fear that someone will discover their secret. In a society that places so much importance on appearance, where we are inundated with advertisements for hair care products which equate beauty with shining hair, alopecia victims do not easily find acceptance.

Alopecia is particularly hard on children and young people, who are its primary victims. Those of us who have children of our own know just how cruel children can be to someone who is "different." Children with alopecia learn to be ashamed of their condition very early because of the cruel teasing they receive from their peers. Sadly enough, this sense of shame is often reinforced by adults. In my own district in Pennsylvania a school recently refused to admit a child because he had alopecia. He was a bright little boy, perfectly capable of keeping up with his schoolwork, but school officials told his parents that he should be sent to a special school just because he was bald.

Most alopecia victims have no idea that so many others share their condition. Often they believe that they are the only ones afflicted with this strange disease. They hide their condition with wigs and makeup, and confide in no one. Fearing detection, they often give up swimming and other sports that might cause their wigs to fall off.

In the past, alopecia victims and their families suffered alone. Then in 1982 Ashley Siegel started an alopecia areata support group in California. Ms. Siegel had turned to alcohol and drugs after she contacted alopecia at the beginning of her freshman year in college, but she waged a successful battle against alcoholism and sought to promote public awareness of alopecia by sharing her story. Ms. Siegel has traveled throughout the country speaking about the disease, and she has appeared on national and local television. Her story has also appeared in several national magazines.

The first small group has grown into the National Alopecia Areata Foundation, a network of support groups in 42 States which has helped thousands of people cope with the physical and emotional problems caused by alopecia areata. The Philadelphia area chapter which serves my district of Pennsylvania is an active support group with over 300 members. They work to reach out to other alopecia victims, to promote public awareness of the disease, and to raise funds for alopecia research.

With sufficient research funding, it is possible that researchers could discover the cure for alopecia areata in this decade. But now alopecia victims need more than dollars—they need our understanding. Most of the trauma associated with alopecia is a direct result of the public ignorance of the disease, and our inability to accept alopecia victims as normal members of society. That is why I believe it is crucial to set aside a week to promote awareness of alopecia areata.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort and to cosponsor my resolution designating "National Alopecia Areata Awareness Week."●

REFORMING COMMITTEE RATIOS

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, as we begin a new Congress, I am today reintroducing a measure designed to deal with an old problem—inequitable committee and subcommittee ratios. In many respects, I wish I did not have to reintroduce what was House Resolution 390 in the 98th Congress. But so long as the leadership of the majority party in this House refuses to grant the minority party representation on committees and subcommittees in accordance with its numerical strength in the full House of Representatives, I feel I have no other choice. A written request for redress in the 96th Congress was ignored. Parliamentary efforts to obtain redress in the 97th and 98th Congresses were defeated on straight party line votes. And the Supreme Court has said that this is a matter that the House of Representatives should deal with absent outside interference. So there is no other choice.

Basically, what this resolution does—and it is identical to the aforementioned House Resolution 390—is provide that, within 30 days, each standing and select committee of the House, except for the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct (Ethics), shall be constituted in the same ratio as exists between the two political parties in the full House of Representatives. In addition, all subcommittees would be constituted in a similarly proportional manner and so would all committee staffs. The only reason the Ethics Committee is excepted is that, unlike any other committee, its ratio of minority to majority members is specifically dictated by rule X, clause 6(a)(2) of the Rules of the House.

A few figures spell out, far more effectively than could 1,000 words, just why this resolution is necessary. In the 96th Congress, 36.3 percent of the Members elected were Republicans but the GOP was given 7 fewer full committee and 38 fewer subcommittee seats than such a percentage would otherwise suggest. In the 97th Congress, things got even worse; after winning 44.14 percent of the congressional seats in the 1980 elections, Republicans were given 31 fewer full committee and 81 fewer subcommittee seats than their electoral showing should have earned them. And in the 98th Congress the problem persisted; after emerging victorious in 38.16 percent of the House races in 1982, the GOP was shorted on full committees and subcommittees to the tune of 23 seats and 62 seats respectively.

What difference do these numbers make? A great deal. While the persistent committee and subcommittee shorting usually involves only one or two seats on a given committee or subcommittee, look at the number of times where one or two more Republican voters might have changed the outcome of a vote. In the Appropriations Committee, for instance, a rescission of funding for a nuclear aircraft carrier was approved by one vote. In the Energy and Commerce Committee last year the same thing; language continuing price controls on natural gas was adopted by one vote. And, in the Foreign Affairs Committee, the removal of restrictions on U.S. arms sales to Turkey carried by only 1 vote. Now that is not to say that the outcome would have been different in every case had Republicans been properly represented. But it could have been. After all, Republicans had less seats than they deserved on all three committees in the 98th Congress, on two of the three in the 97th Congress and on one of the three (Appropriations) in the 96th Congress.

For the benefit of those Members who are new to this body, the rationale that is given for this rather systematic under-representation of Republicans on committees and subcommittees is that a working majority is needed for those bodies to function effectively. By working majority what is meant is not just a majority of Democrats on committees—they are assured that already—but a majority of like-minded Democrats. All of which means that any Democrat who is not like minded has a problem not unlike that faced by the Republicans. Unless truly proportional committee and subcommittee ratios are adopted, Democrats at odds with their party leadership on various issues will be substantially hindered in their ability to form bipartisan coalitions just as surely as will Republicans. So this is not just partisan issue. It is an issue that affects Members on both sides of the aisle and in a way that has profound implications for the future of representative government in the country. For if the ability of some Members to represent their constituents is artificially diluted, then those constituents are effectively denied equal representation.

Mr. Speaker, let me elaborate on this all important point a moment. In theory at least, this House is supposed to represent everybody in this great Nation of ours to the same degree. That's why congressional districts have to be approximately the same size regardless of the State in which they are located. But, if Members of one political party or faction are given an advantage over members of another political party or faction in excess of that provided them by the voters, then some voters are not getting the same degree of representation as others. Certainly, the Constitution intended that the will of the majority be expressed, and the Rules of the House reflect that desire, but what we are talking about here is an abridgement of the "one-man, one-vote" concept which, if allowed to continue unabated, could turn the will of the majority into the tyranny of the majority all too quickly.

Take, for example, what has occurred in the Energy and Commerce Committee in recent years. In the 96th Congress, in which Republicans held 159 of the House seats, the Democrat majority gave the GOP 15 of 42 full committee seats and 34 of 102, or one third, of the subcommittee seats. But, in the 98th Congress, to which 7 more Republicans were elected than to the 96th Congress, Republicans still got only 15 of 42 full committee seats and, worse yet, only 28 of 90, or 31.1 percent of the subcommittee seats. Now, it is possible that when the Energy and Commerce Committee and its subcommittees are constituted for the 99th Congress they will reflect the 14 seat gain that Republicans made in the past election. But, absent any requirement in House rules that committee and subcommittee ratios accurately reflect the party breakdown in the full House, it is also possible that Republicans could be given only 30 percent or even 25 percent of the seats on the subcommittees of the Energy and Commerce Committee. And they wouldn't be able to do anything about it.

That thought I mind, I might also point out that in practically every other parliamentary democracy in the world, proportional representation on legislative committees is a fact of life. It has also been a fact of life over in the other body these past 4 years even though the majority party there is in the minority in this House. Therefore, I would hope that the majority party in this House would see the light and decide to support the resolution I am introducing today. Fairness—something the majority party has claimed to champion in recent months—dictates no less.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of Members who wish to take a closer look at this whole matter, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution I am introducing be printed in the RECORD at this point. I also ask unanimous consent that several charts detailing the extent to which Republicans have been denied equitable representation on full committees, subcommittees, and committee staffs be printed in the RECORD after the resolution.

H. RES. 24

Resolution to correct the current disproportional seating on the committees and subcommittees of the United States House of Representatives, and for other purposes

Resolved, That effective thirty days after the adoption of this resolution, each standing and select committee of the House, except for the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, shall be consitituted in a ratio which is proportionate to the membership of the two political parties in the House as a whole; and each subcommittee thereof shall also be so constituted; and insofar as practicable, the staffs of each committee shall also reflect these same ratios.

Methodology: Use the number of Democratic slots on each committee as a base. In all cases, compute the proper ratio on the basis of the party split in the House of Representtives at the time of organization. The five nonvoting Members are not included in this calculation, but they are included in committee counts, where applicable, because they do vote in committee.

SALUTE TO DR. EDWARD L. GINZTEN

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Dr. Edward L. Ginzten, retired chairman of Varian Associates, who was honored at the 15th annual meeting of the Stanford Mid-Peninsula Urban Coalition on November 29, 1984. Dr. Ginzten's record of service to his community marks him as one of the truly extraordinary citizens of California.

As one of the founders of the coalition in 1968, Dr. Ginzten worked very hard to bring together people from local corporations, government, educational institutions, and community organizations to address the social issues brought to the forefront by the civil rights movement of the 1960's. It was his belief that these problems had to be addressed at the local level by a partnership of people in the community. His tireless efforts in the critical early years of the Stanford Mid-Peninsula Urban Coalition were a key to its success and his continued support of the organization for the past 16 years has contributed greatly to its effectiveness.

Dr. Ginzten has been particularly concerned about the need for affordable housing in the counties of San Mateo and Santa Clara in the State of California. As cochair of the urban coalition, he was instrumental in founding the Mid-Peninsula Housing Development Corp. in 1970 to build housing for low and middle income families in the area. This corporation now operates independently and continues to build housing units in San Mateo and Santa Clara Counties. Dr. Ginzten currently serves on its board of directors.

I commend Mr. Ginzten to you once again, Mr. Speaker, and to our colleagues, as a man truly in the tradition of our very best public citizens: compassionate in his ideals, and caring in his community.●

CONGRESSIONAL ADVISORY COMMISSION ON AMATEUR BOXING AND FEDERAL PROFESSIONAL BOXING PROHIBITION ACT OF 1985

HON. HENRY B. GONZALEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing a bill today that I first introduced last October to ban professional boxing and to establish a Congressional Advisory Commission on Amateur Boxing. Incident after tragic incident occurs, bringing pain and sorrow to families of men who are injured or killed in this violent sport, and it is time for Congress to do something about it.

For many years I have watched as young men, mostly black or Hispanic, mostly poor, uneducated, and without trade or employment, have been recruited, trained, and encouraged to fight their way out of poverty into the world of boxing. Boxing is their salvation, they are told—it is their road out of the ghetto. Boxing supposedly gives them opportunities they otherwise never would have. Boxing supposedly gives them a reason to stay out of trouble, to have a purpose in life, a future respect. I have watched all this—and listened—and I am impelled now to act.

My bill bans only professional boxing in order to remove the illusory incentives of a professional boxing career. For amateur boxing, my bill would establish a Congressional Advisory Commission. This Commission would study amateur boxing and its present regulations, determine the sufficiency of the current safeguards, and make recommendations for future action to be taken to protect the health and potential of America's young boxers. I recognize that amateur boxing provides some limited opportunities for young men, but prolonged participation in boxing clearly has proven harmful effects on the health of fighters. With some safeguards, amateur boxing can be a positive experience—but only if the boxing is carried on with strict safety regulations and for only a short period of time.

But professional boxing is another matter. What kind of opportunities are provided these young men through professional boxing? The opportunities I see all involve violence, personal injury, and massive exploitation. The very goal of a boxer in the ring is to render his opponent unconscious—to fight until only one fighter remains standing. Boxing is a simplistic display of one man's physical prowess prevailing over his opponent's.

But even the victor must share an element of physical defeat, for by the very act of knocking his opponent senseless, he too endures physical abuse. One fighter may prevail over the other, but neither prevails over the limitations of the human body.

Repeated blows to the fighter's head are the most direct means to victory for a boxer—professional boxers are paid to hit and be hit. But just as a boxer is paid, he also pays dearly in return for the sometimes silent but ever present injuries his brain suffers. The American Medical Association has studied the prolonged effects of boxing on a fighter's brain, and has reached the same conclusion as I have—that professional boxing should be banned. Every professional boxer suffers some degree of brain damage—every one. Some of the damage is minimal; some is readily evident; some does not manifest itself for years, all the while keeping its dreadful consequences hidden from the knowledge of the boxer. We all know the familiar stereotype of the hasbeen Palooka, the shambling wrecks of fighters who took one, or a thousand, too many punches.

If boxing provides such wonderful opportunities, as I am told, then why aren't young men from all walks of life recruited for the sport? Why are educational opportunities, mainstream employment, and long-term beneficial opportunities saved for some of America's youth while boxing and other violent sports seek participants from America's poorer corners? I find it appalling to think that at the expense of a real future—a future of health, of learning, of meaningful work—young men devote their early years to training to become fighters at the expense of their education and time to learn a trade or profession.

Young men are exploited by the boxing profession—the promise of fame and riches is flashed in their eyes so they are blinded to the realities of a fighter's life—a life where few are famous, few are wealthy, but all risk their health. We all know that for every Leonard or Ali there are 1,000 Kims, 10,000 punched-out wrecks. For a youngster from a poor neighborhood who has few material possessions, his health may be all he has. Boxing will likely take his health and almost certainly give him nothing in return. How much better it would be to allow him to keep his health and develop his mind and his abilities. How much better it would be to develop his mind than to render it useless through fighting.

Once professional boxing is made illegal, amateur fighters will have no incentive to pursue boxing in lieu of their education and training. There will be no illusions of making a living from boxing. Since there will be no monetary rewards from boxing, a boxer's career will be relatively short, and the damage to his health, particularly with the use of safety equipment and stringent safety regulations, will be minimal.

I think we owe all of America's youth equal opportunities for a solid education and useful, financially satisfying employment. Each young man has the right to his health, and we owe each young man an education and future—a road out of poverty that does not dead end in boxing, but a mainstream of education and training that leads to a healthy and secure fut re. We must stop guiding some youth toward the opportunities and security of Madison Avenue while guiding others toward the eventual empty destitution of Madison Square Garden.●

SUPPORT FOR THE SYNTHETIC FUELS PROGRAM

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, in late November, it was my pleasure to be present in New York when Mr. John K. McKinley, chairman and chief executive officer of Texaco, received the first award named for our outstanding former colleague, the Walter Flowers Achievement Award in Synthetic Fuels.

For the information of the Members, I would like to include in the RECORD, the remarks made by Mr. McKinley in accepting the award.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS BY JOHN K. MCKINLEY

Thank you, Mr. Hopkins. I am very pleased to attend this luncheon and honored to receive, on behalf of Texaco, the Walter Flowers Achievement Award in Synthetic Fuels.

It is also of particular meaning for me personally to accept this award. As a Congressman, Walter Flowers represented Tuscaloosa, AL, the city where I was born and where I attended the University of Alabama. But more importantly, as chairman of the Congressional Subcommittee on Energy Research concerned with fossil fuels, Walter Flowers represented and encouraged in others the forward-looking spirit that has made this Nation great.

Some of you might wonder why Texaco, an organization that considers itself primarily an oil and gas company, is receiving an award for synthetic fuels.

Quite simply, we at Texaco believe that alternate energy sources are a wave of the future. There is no question about it: that wave right now is a very small one, barely visible if you are standing on the beach. But if you row out to where it is forming, you will find it gathering momentum. And when that wave becomes a breaker, Texaco has every intention of being right there, riding its crest.

Oil and natural gas continue to be the workhorses of America's economy. They currently provide 67 percent of its energy. Over the long term, the trend of petroleum production in the United States is definitely downward. If we as a nation want to use our energy resources wisely we will direct our supplies of oil and natural gas toward those areas where they can be used most efficiently—home heating, transportable fuels, petrochemical feedstocks, and lubricants.

And if America wants to have reasonable security as to energy to power its factories and to provide electricity to its homes, schools and places of work, it will continue efforts to develop alternate forms of energy.

The key question is: What types of alternate energies will be most workable in the United States?

Nuclear power appears to have stumbled at the starting gate, weighted down as it is with political, economic, financial and public relations problems.

Solar energy was boosted by some as the brightest object in the universe several years ago, but it seems currently to have gone behind a cloud.

Then, what kinds of alternate energies might be made available in the quantities needed to provide electricity and other forms of stationary power?

Synthetic fuels offer the prospect of filling that need. And there is one particular reason for that: coal. America is sitting on top of 20,000 to 25,000 quads of energy in the form of coal. America is the Saudi Arabia of coal.

That's the good news about coal. The bad news, as almost every observer knows, is that the production and use of coal is being linked, rightly or wrongly, with a wide range of environmental concerns, most prominently acid rain.

To the environmentalist, this is a major concern. To the businessman, this is a challenge, and ultimately, an opportunity.

The American energy industry is being challenged to devise ways to put America's vast reserves of coal to use—to find ways to make coal a clean, flexible and efficient source of energy. This was the challenge back in the 1940's when Texaco first began research in gasification. While it continues to be the challenge today, great strides have been made.

Texaco developed its coal gasification process in a step-by-step, systematic fashion. As a result, the Texaco process has established its commercial viability as a reliable, cost-effective way to produce clean, medium Btu synthesis gas from coal, which in turn can be used for power generation, fertilizer manufacture and chemical feedstock.

In the early stages there were the demonstration units. One such is the 165-ton-per-day gasifer, operating since 1978, at the Ruhrchemie A.G. chemical plant in West Germany. It converts coal into synthesis gas for use in oxo-chemicals manufacture.

The Ruhrchemie plant was followed by a 190-ton-per-day coal gasifer at the Tennessee Valley Authority facilities in Muscle Shoals, AL. This plant first produced synthesis gas as a feedstock for ammonia manufacturing in 1982.

These demonstration units led to today's commercial plants. The Tennessee Eastman plant in Kingsport TN, for example, uses the Texaco process to convert 900 tons per day of coal into synthesis gas to produce methanol and acetic anhydride.

In Japan, the Ube Ammonia Industry Company has just started operation of the first of three commercial facilities it is building. These units make synthesis gas from coal for the production of ammonia.

The most recent commercial facility, the one with which you are probably most familiar, is the 1,000-ton-per-day coal gasification plant in Daggett, CA. The project is often referred to as the cool water project, the name of the Southern California Edison Powerplant nearby. This project is particularly unique for two reasons. One, it is the first commercial-scale powerplant using coal gasification in the United States—and I might add, the first we believe of many to come. Second, it represents and reflects the commitment of several companies in private industry to work together toward a common objective.

We believe the Texaco gasification process, which is the heart of cool water, is now, and will continue to be, a major factor in the development of synthetic fuels because it satisfies the three critical factors of success for any coal-based energy technology:

First, it is clean. No synfuels program will be successful which does not take into account the realities of today's America, which call for a cleaner and safer environment.

Second, the process is flexible, a particularly important prerequisite for the utility industry which, like the oil business, is trying to project future demand in a climate of uncertainty. Texaco's technology allows the modular construction and incremental sizing of plants according to particular needs, and also allows use of a wide variety of feedstocks.

The third factor is the bottom line. This gasification process can compete successfully with most conventional coal technology in producing electricity. Our calculations show the cost of power from a Texaco-process plant to be some 10 percent below that of a conventional coal-fired plant with full clean-up equipment.

Looking forward, we believe the primary use of gasification will be for the production of electricity. Syngas, however, is highly versatile. It is a commercially proven building block for producing such products as methanol ammonia and hydrogen—each of which is enjoying renewed interest:

Many refiners are now using methanol as a high octane blending agent for motor gasoline.

Syngas is already the source of ammonia, here and abroad.

The petroleum industry is using hydrogen increasingly to upgrade heavy oil to distillates and fuels.

Each of these, and the many other alternative products from syngas, help create new markets, new business opportunities and new potentials for profit.

The optimism I have expressed here today is not voiced in disregard of the facts around us in the energy markets. Uncertainty as to oil price, overcapacity and severe competition abound. Nevertheless, we see a current niche for synfuels—and particularly for the process which you have recognized and honored with this award today.

On behalf of all those at Texaco, and those in the other organizations which have supported and contributed to the development of this process—thank you.

It is an honor to accept this award.●

PUBLIC PRODUCTIVITY ACT: RENEWING AMERICA'S INFRASTRUCTURE

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, 4 years ago the book "America in Ruins," by Pat Choate and Susan Walters, focused the Nation's attention on the deteriorating condition of our public capital resources, and made infrastructure a fitting item for the front cover of Newsweek magazine, and major feature articles for U.S. News & World Report and Time magazine.

In the past few years infrastructure has slipped from the front pages—except when a bridge collapses or a road turns into a bomb-scape of potholes, and the Nation has turned to concern for Federal spending, the deficit, and the national budget. But the deterioration of our infrastructure has not ceased with the headlines, and America's once proud portfolio of public capital resources continues to fall to ruin. The costs of replacing that portfolio in the future will dwarf any repair and rehabilitation program we might undertake now.

The legislation I propose today would provide the seeds of a comprehensive program to rehabilitate, repair, and renovate our streets, roads, and bridges, our water and wastewater treatment systems, and our public buildings. This bill is identical to H.R. 5765, the Infrastructure Improvement and Public Productivity Act, which I introduced in the 98th Congress.

The bill will not solve the entire, multitrillion-dollar infrastructure problem in this country. Nor can Federal grants do the job alone. But I am convinced of the need for a grants program specifically targeted to distressed areas to help them protect and improve their infrastructure, which is the prerequisite for any more comprehensive economic development efforts.

The bill has two purposes: first, to protect our priceless existing investment in public capital by reversing the neglect and negative investment of the last several decades; and, second, to prevent future neglect by assisting owners and operators of public facilities to establish long-term capital improvement programs to assure maintenance and upkeep of this national resource.

The Infrastructure Improvement and Public Productivity Act of 1985 is a multiyear, one-shot catchup program to assist owners and operators of public capital in restoring private productivity by upgrading local public facilities and making them more productive. This bill would provide $2 billion per year in grants, on a 50/50 matching basis, to distressed areas to repair, renovate, reconstruct, or construct public facilities which contribute to that area's economic growth and development.

Eligible recipients would be owners and operators of economic development-related public facilities: States, counties, townships, municipalities, and special districts such as water and sanitation districts and port authorities.

Funds would be apportioned to reward those States and other levels of government making the greatest effort to preserve their own public facilities, and would target areas where the needs are the greatest.

State-by-State allocations would be made on a four-part formula which reflects population, fiscal capacity, tax effort, and capital expenditures. At the sub-State level, funds would be divided roughly on the basis of each level of government's share of capital spending, that is, by the State itself, counties, townships, municipalities, and special districts. Projects would have to be located in, or substantially benefit, distressed areas.

Funds could be used for the construction, renovation, reconstruction, and repair of public facilities. New construction would be permitted where no similar facilities already exist. Funds could also be used to supplement a grant for a similar project made under another Federal program as long as the total Federal share did not exceed 80 percent.

The bill further requires that funds be apportioned fairly between urban and rural areas.

The bill looks to the future by establishing a pattern of capital budgeting and capital improvement programming so that, once an area has caught up with its deferred infrastructure needs, it won't go back to its old ways of doing business, and allow its newly refurbished facilities to deteriorate again.

Once funds have been allocated to the States, the Governor is required to set aside 1 percent of that allocation for capital improvement programs. The State itself, and any local governments, could receive a grant on a one-time basis to develop a capital improvement program.

The CIP would be a 5-year schedule of capital improvements based on agreed upon priorities, available funding sources, and local financing capabilities. It would include a list of all proposed capital improvements ranked in order of priority, and identification of all possible funding sources, an analysis of the financing capability of the local government, and a schedule or timetable for development.

A capital improvements program for all of an owner/operator's public facilities would be the condition for receiving funding under this program for repair or improvement of a single project or element in that overall program.

I want to note also that this bill will dovetail nicely with the National Development Investment Act, which I have also introduced today. This bill requires communities to design development investment strategies as a prerequisite for individual projects. These strategies will be important components of the capital improvement programs developed under this legislation.

I include with my remarks a summary of the Infrastructure Improvement and Public Productivity Act.

INFRASTRUCTURE IMPROVEMENT AND PUBLIC PRODUCTIVITY ACT

Purpose: To establish a multiyear infrastructure repair program by assisting State and local governments in addressing the urgent need to repair and rehabilitate aging public facilities and to encourage the establishment of capital improvement programs that include life-cycle management of capital improvements.

What the bill does: The Act would authorize $2 billion annually for a period of five years for 50% grants to States, Territories, Counties, Municipalities, Townships, Special Districts, and Authorities for the construction, renovation, reconstruction, and repair of public facilities that are located in or will substantially benefit UDAG (Urban Development Action Grant) eligible areas.

Eligible projects: Grants would be available for the construction, renovation and repair of public facilties such as any road, street, bridge, water or wastewater-treatment system, building, and any other facility related to the economic development of the area.

Emphasis is placed on renovation and repair projects, and new construction projects are only permitted where basic facility does not exist in the area.

Limitations: Grant can only be made if project is part of capital improvement program; enhances economic development opportunities; contributes substantially to the economic development of the area; is not inconsistent with areawide plans; applicant demonstrates maintenance of effort; could not otherwise be done; applicant demonstrates compliance with Davis-Bacon Act.

Allocation of funds: 1% set-aside of funds appropriated for Secretary to conduct research for improving productivity, management, and extending useful life of public facilities and for the development of new materials, technologies and methods for repairing public facilities.

One-fourth of 1% set-aside, each for Puerto Rico and the Territories.

Funds to be allocated to each of the States by a formula which considers population, fiscal capacity, tax effort, and capital expenditures.

1% set-aside of funds allocated to each State to be used to make grants to establish and improve capital budgeting and capital improvement programs. Economic Development Districts and Areawide Planning Agencies may be used for this purpose.●

UNIVERSITY FACILITIES AND EXPERT REVIEW

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, as part of the continuing dialog relating to university facilities and expert review, I wish to call your attention to a letter which Frank Press, president of the National Academy of Sciences, has sent to the individual members of the academy.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES,
Washington, D.C., December 12, 1984.

Members of the National Academy of Sciences

DEAR COLLEAGUE: I am writing to you to describe briefly a problem of great significance to American science and to enlist your support in its resolution. In the past two years there have been a significant number of efforts by academic institutions to secure funding for major scientific or engineering facilities, bypassing established evaluation procedures based on merit and the normal appropriations process. These efforts led to direct legislative intervention by members of Congress acting on behalf of some universities, which have drawn funds from relatively scarce research budgets that are essential to the entire research university system. If they were to escalate, the possibility of undermining the evaluation and review system that has been responsible for the great strength of American science, will become a reality.

None of these direct political approaches to secure funds from the research budget would have occurred if they were not initiated by members of our own community. I am therefore writing to each of you, requesting that you play a leadership role in your own institution and in your own region to advocate the thoughtful, deliberative process of evaluation and to resist involving the political process. It is in the long-term interest of a strong American science to use procedures that we all respect, and to resist special-interest political favoritism that can only hurt the overall scientific endeavor.

I write this letter realizing full well that in the past "bricks and mortar" appropriations have been part of the political process and are indeed the prerogatives of Congress and the Executive Branch. What is of new concern is that our own colleagues, faced with the absence of a national program to construct new facilities for science, and stressed by severe local conditions, will compete with each other in the political arena, instead of working together to develop a coherent national program for addressing these urgent needs.

I enclose a statement of the Council of the Academy which was adopted last fall.

Yours sincerely,

FRANK PRESS, President.

Enclosure.

STATEMENT OF THE COUNCIL: FEDERAL FUNDING FOR RESEARCH FACILITIES AND INSTRUMENTATION

In recent months, there have been a few instances in which federal funding decisions for major university scientific facilities have not been subject to an appropriate review process. Informed peer judgments on the scientific merits of specific proposals, in open competition, should be a central element in the awarding of all federal funds for science.

In the past, such objective systems of evaluation have met the needs of our country well, and have contributed to the scientific preeminence of the United States. In the long term, they also help to maintain the pluralism that is important to the productivity of American science and is characteristic of political decision making.

We urge that the academic community and public officials exercise vigilance to protect this informed evaluation and decision-making process in the awarding of funds, not only for the support of scientific research proposals, but also for major scientific facilities and instrumentation.●

A NEW BONNEVILLE LOCK: PROGRESS AND PROSPERITY ON THE COLUMBIA

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to introduce legislation authorizing the construction of a new lock at Bonneville Dam on the Columbia River. In addition, I am pleased that my Northwest colleagues Mr. AUCOIN, Mr. FOLEY, Mr. ROBERT F. SMITH, Mr. MORRISON of Washington, Mr. DICKS, Mr. BONKER, Mr. CRAIG, and Mr. DENNY SMITH, are joining me as original cosponsors of this critical project.

The House of Representatives acted responsibly last year by passing an omnibus water projects bill that included a cost-sharing plan under which one-third of the inland project costs, such as those for a new Bonneville lock, would be borne by users. Yet the Senate, hampered by administration opposition to its water resources bill as well as the House-passed bill, failed to act and, consequently, we are entering our 15th straight year without a major water resources authorization.

Such inaction is irresponsible, unacceptable and simply poor public policy. Those who have fought the authorization of new water resources projects state that they want to cut Federal spending. That is a good goal which we all can support. Yet the increased costs resulting from these delays would seem to offset most of the savings being sought for the Federal Government. For example, when I first introduced the Bonneville lock authorization bill in 1981, the cost was estimated at $145 million. When I introduced it in 1983, the estimated cost had risen to $167 million. As I introduce this bill today, the estimated cost of a new lock at Bonneville Dam is $191 million.

If the new Bonneville lock had been authorized and construction had begun in 1981, the savings to the Federal Government potentially could have been almost $50 million from the current project cost.

Moreover, it is in the national interest, not just the regional interests of the Pacific Northwest, that this project—as well as others that will strengthen our national waterway system—be authorized.

I have met with countless exporters who tell me that, next to the overvalued dollar, their biggest obstacle to expanding export markets is transportation costs. The completion of the new lock will save shippers an estimated $2.50 per ton, favorably influencing the cost of commodities and other products consumed in this country and abroad. So it will be not be just the shippers and exporters of the Pacific Northwest that will benefit, but any exporter throughout the country who uses the strategically situated Columbia-Snake system to ship goods to the Pacific Rim and beyond.

A new lock at Bonneville Dam also will augment our national security by providing an efficient northern maritime transportation route not dependent on passage through the Panama Canal.

A new lock at Bonneville will be the single biggest jobs producer in the Northwest and will leverage an estimated $500 million in new private investment. The need for a new lock at Bonneville Dam and the cost-effectiveness of this project have been documented and acknowledged by the Army Corps of Engineers, the House of Representatives and the Senate. In fact, during the 98th Congress, the House of Representatives passed both authorizing and appropriating legislation for a new lock at Bonneville.

Specifically, this lock is needed to meet growing maritime commerce activity on the Columbia-Snake River System, one of the fastest growing navigation systems in the United States. Major commodities shipped along the system include grain, petroleum, containerized general cargo, forest products, automobiles, steel and dry bulks. In fact, the Columbia-Snake system is virtually the only U.S. shallow-draft waterway handling barged containers.

The Columbia-Snake system serves as the major transportation hub and distribution center for the Pacific Northwest. It is served by major interstate highways, rail lines and steamship and barge services, providing a true multi-modal transportation system.

Yet the weak link in this strong multi-modal transportation system is the archaic lock at Bonneville Dam. This lock, which was built in 1938, is too old and too small. In fact, it is the oldest and smallest lock on the seven-lock river system and because it is the last lock on the system, barge traffic that has come all the way down the river often is forced to break up into smaller tows to lock through the Bonneville Dam. Not only does this situation cause delays, which cost the Government and shippers money, but it also creates safety hazards.

In 1980, 9,775,000 short tons were shipped along the Columbia-Snake system. By 2000, the Columbia-Snake Marketing Group estimates that 28,017,000 short tons will be shipped along the system. This figure is based upon goods currently shipped along the system and does not even take into account new goods that would be attracted to the river by the efficiency of a new lock at Bonneville.

So it is clear that the potential for untapped growth on the Columbia-Snake River system exists and that the current Bonneville Lock will not be able to handle this growth. In fact, the Corps of Engineers has pegged the capacity of the existing lock at 13 million tons per year and projects that that saturation level will be reached between 1988 and 1990.

I would also like to note that I have included language in this bill that instructs the Corps of Engineers to take into account economic, legal and environmental concerns when determining where dredge spoils from the project should be deposited. This language will not require any additional studies that could delay the project; it does, however, ensure that careful consideration will be given to this important question so that sensitive environments will not be adversely affected by the dredge spoils from the lock.

The increasing barge, freighter and tug traffic on the Columbia, spawned by the Northwest's growing import and export community, is a grown man doing its best to fit into children's clothing. But we cannot even approach our maximum productivity with the restricted access through the existing lock to downriver ports, which are our gateway to the Pacific Rim and to our future.

A new lock at Bonneville Dam is essential if the Columbia-Snake system is to reach its potential as a major league waterway. It is the key to progress and prosperity along the Columbia River.

H.R. 233

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Bonneville lock and dam project, Oregon and Washington, authorized by the first section of the Act entitled "An Act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes", approved August 30, 1935 (49 Stat. 1038), is hereby modified to provide that the Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers, is authorized to construct a new look in accordance with the report of the Chief of Engineers, dated February 10, 1981, at an estimated cost of $191,000,000. In constructing such new lock, the Secretary shall evaluate sites for the disposal of dredged material from such project taking into account economic, legal, and environmental concerns and shall select a site or sites for the disposal of such dredged material based on such evaluations.●

OSTEOPOROSIS—A SILENT EPIDEMIC

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce legislation today which would designate the first week of May 1985 as "National Osteoporosis Awareness Week."

With this legislative initiative I hope to bring attention to a debilitating bone condition which strikes 15 to 20 million of our older Americans. Although older men are often afflicted by a senile form of osteoporosis, this is a disorder which mainly affects older women. Osteoporosis currently poses a threat to one-fourth of women after menopause.

Osteoporosis is a "thinning" of the bones. This debilitating bone degeneration is associated with aging, low calcium levels, and loss of estrogen. Men are affected by osteoporosis too, but women—particularly thin, white women—are prone to lose bone mass at a rate twice that of men. According to some estimates, the postmenopausal woman can lose as much as 38 milligrams of calcium a day, which results in approximately 1 percent overall calcium loss each year. The deprivation of this important element weakens the bones, causing fractures—in fact, an estimated 1 million fractures a year.

Older women are the fastest growing segment of our population, making osteoporosis a rapidly increasing problem. It is estimated that osteoporosis costs the Nation over $6 billion annually in health care expenditures including long-term care and lost earnings by afflicted older workers.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to expand on this important point by providing a breakdown of the cost of osteoporosis as estimated by Columbia University:

	Thousands
Direct costs:
Hospital inpatient services	2,259,750
Outpatient and emergency room institutional services	38,150
Outpatient diagnostic and therapeutic services	4,130
Physician inpatient services	345,690
Physician office, outpatient and emergency room services.	153,980
Other practitioner services	54,960
Drugs	2,030
Nursing home services	2,312,605
Prepayments and administration	128,640
Nonhealth sector goods and service	428,800
Total direct costs	5,728,735
Indirect costs:
Lost earning—wage earners	362,140
Lost earning—homemakers	53,300
Total costs	6,144,175

Every year 200,000 osteoporotic women over the age of 45 fracture one or more of their bones. Among those who live to age 90, approximately one-third of women and 17 percent of men will suffer a hip fracture that will prevent them from fully regaining normal activity and may result in institutionalization. Severe cases of osteoporosis can, therefore, often mean the end of independent living and the beginning of dependency in the older individual.

It has been estimated that more than 50,000 elderly American women die every year of complications of hip fractures—10,000 more than those who die annually from breast cancer. In addition to bone fractures, this bone condition can also cause the body "to collapse on itself"; the "dowager's hump" is an example of the progressive shortening of the spine and is one of the few visible signs of osteoporosis. On the average, people lose an inch in height as they age. A woman suffering from vertebrae collapse can eventually lose a total of 8 inches or more from her adult height. These fractures and the resultant deformity and disability is accompanied by a great deal of physical and emotional pain.

The cause of osteoporosis is not yet clearly understood. It has been suggested that along with a lowering estrogen level, a sedentary life style and a low calcium intake can also allow this bone condition to develop. Those individuals with a family history of osteoporosis are at increased risk as well.

The best treatment of the disorder is prevention. Studies have shown that 80 percent of bone fractures resulting from thinning of the bones can be avoided with increased intake of calcium and estrogen—50 percent of all fractures could be avoided with the use of calcium alone. Younger women in their thirties and forties need to be especially aware of the importance of daily exercise and calcium intake. For years doctors believed that calcium was not that essential in the diet of adults. This thinking, however, is now changing in view of the evidence that an adequate daily intake of calcium may be the best weapon in the prevention of osteoporosis.

Most Americans do not realize they are calcium deficient with an average daily intake of 450 to 550 milligrams. It is now recommended that individuals should: One, take calcium supplements of 1,000 milligrams a day in their thirties and 1,300 milligrams a day after age 40; two, exercise daily by such weight-bearing exercises as walking or jogging; three, reduce caffeine intake and stop smoking.

By designating the first week in May, "Older Americans Month", as "National Osteoporosis Awareness Week", I hope to focus attention on this serious problem and also to help warn our elderly population and those soon to be elderly. Through an active education program, perhaps through the Department of Health and Human Services [HHS], the State and area agencies on aging, and the National Institutes of Health, we can reduce the incidence of osteoporosis and the pain, deformity, disability, and expenditures associated with the disorder. To this end, I urge my colleagues' support and assistance.

H.J. RES. 46

Joint resolution to designate the week of May 1 through May 7, 1985, as "National Osteoporosis Awareness Week".

Whereas 15 to 20 million persons in the United States are afflicted with osteoporosis, a degenerative bone condition;

Whereas approximately 25 percent of postmenopausal women in the United States develop osteoporosis;

Whereas 32 percent of women and 17 percent of men who live to be age 90 will likely suffer a hip fracture due primarily to osteoporosis;

Whereas more than 50,000 older women and many older men die each year in the United States as a result of hip fracture complications;

Whereas hip fracture complications often result in loss of independence for older persons;

Whereas approximately $6 billion is expended annually in the United States for health care costs relating to osteoporosis;

Whereas osteoporosis is associated with the loss of bone tissue due to lack of estrogen and low calcium intake;

Whereas the majority of persons are unaware of the condition of osteoporosis; and

Whereas the best treatment for osteoporosis is prevention through education: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of May 1 through May 7, 1985, hereby is designated "National Osteoporosis Awareness Week", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate activities.●

THE ENTERPRISE ZONE EMPLOYMENT AND DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1985

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today in this 99th Congress, the Enterprise Zone Employment and Development Act of 1985. This legislation was developed in consultation with many Members of Congress, the administration, and has strong bipartisan support in this body.

Enactment of this Enterprise Zone Program will provide for an experimental, free-market initiative to deal with economic distress in inner cities and rural towns. The program has two objectives: the first is to create jobs in depressed areas of our Nation's cities, both large and small, and particularly to create jobs for disadvantaged workers and the long-term, hardcore unemployed. The second goal is to redevelop and revitalize economically depressed geographic areas.

The underlying concept of the Enterprise Zone proposal is to create a market environment in depressed areas through relief from taxation, regulation, and governmental burden. Our goal is to improve municipal services, to increase the involvement of the private sector, to get organizations, neighborhood associations, and citizens groups active in our depressed cities. Most importantly, because the program is based on the concept of removing the governmental regulations, rather than providing Government subsidies, it will require no Federal appropriations. In fact, because of the increased business activity and job creation, this legislation will actually contribute to the reduction of the Federal deficit by reducing the number of people on unemployment and other means of support and providing them with jobs that provide taxes to the Federal coffers.

The purpose of this program is intended to stimulate new economic activity within areas that have not otherwise had any new activity at all. The intent behind this program is not to stimulate any particular kind of business, but rather to let the market decide what kind of activities should take place within these enterprise zones. As opposed to some Federal tax programs, this program provides a genuinely balanced set of stimuli for a broad range of economic activities and businesses. States and cities will be key participants in the Enterprise Zone Program. In fact, by the end of 1982, 11 States had enacted enterprise zone legislation and over the past 2 years, many more have considered such bills. This Enterprise Zone Program is creative federalism at its best. State and local governments will provide incentives and contributions to the enterprise zones under this program. Their participation is vital to an integrated effort at all three levels of government.

Mr. Speaker, this program is not a cure-all for unemployment. It is not intended to be a substitute for other Federal programs. It is an attempt, at no net cost, to provide something new at a time when our Nation needs new ideas and new approaches to solve our economic and employment problems.

I will urge expeditious consideration of this legislation in the Ways and Means Committee as well as the Banking and Judiciary Committees, as these are the committees that had jurisdiction over this legislation in the last Congress.

I am including here a review of the principal features of the proposed legislation for printing in the RECORD.

I urge my colleagues to join me in this bipartisan effort to create jobs, to reduce unemployment and to strengthen the economic activity of our Nation.

SUMMARY OF THE ENTERPRISE ZONE EMPLOYMENT AND DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1985

OBJECTIVES

The proposed Enterprise Zone program is an experimental, free-market initiative for dealing with economic distress in inner cities and rural towns. Its objectives are twofold:

To create jobs in depressed areas of our Nation's cities, large and small, particularly jobs for disadvantaged workers and long-term unemployed individuals.

To redevelop and revitalize the geographic zone areas themselves.

CONCEPTS

The underlying concept of Enterprise Zones is to create a free-market environment in depressed areas through: relief from taxes, regulations and other government burdens; improved municipal services; and involvement of private entities, organizations, neighborhood associations, and citizens groups. Because the program is based on the concept of removing government burdens rather than providing government subsidies, it involves no Federal appropriations.

The removal of these burdens will create a climate for the enterprise system to flourish within the zones, allowing private sector firms and entrepeneurs to create jobs and expand economic activity.

The program is intended primarily to stimulate new economic activity within the zones which would not otherwise have occurred at all, anywhere, rather than to encourage existing outside activity to relocate into the zones. In addition, the intent behind the program is not to stimulate a particular kind of business, but rather to let the market decide what activities should take place in the zones. While the Federal tax incentives are skewed towards labor-intensive businesses and jobs for disadvantaged workers, the program generally provides a balanced set of stimuli for a broad range of economic activities and businesses.

PROGRAM STRUCTURE

The proposed legislation establishes what areas are eligible to be designated Enterprise Zones based on criteria concerning poverty, unemployment, and other indicators of distress. However, this is not an entitlement program, and, consequently, eligible areas do not automatically become Enterprise Zones. Rather, an eligible area must first be nominated by its local and State governments. Both the nominating State and local governments would then apply to the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development for Federal designation. In general, any jurisdiction satisfying the minimum population requirements and which is eligible under the UDAG program would be eligible for State and local nomination if it meets the distress criteria.

The Secretary of Housing and Urban Development will then evaluate the zone nomination on a competitive basis. The primary criterion for choosing which proposed zones will receive Federal designation will be the quality and strength of the incentives to be contributed by the State and local governments. Particular emphasis will be given to incentives and contributions consistent with the overall Enterprise Zone theme of creating an open market environment through the removal of government burdens. These contributions may include tax relief, regulatory relief, increase in the level of efficiency of local services possibly through experimentation with private sector providers of public services, and involvement in the program of private entities, and neighborhood and community groups. Other contributions and factors will also be considered in this competition.

A maximum of 75 zones will be approved during the first three years of the program. There is a rural setaside of at least one-third of the zones designated over the three year period. Each zone's designation will last for the period chosen by the nominating State and local governments, with a maximum of 20 years of Federal participation, plus a four-year phaseout of that participation. The Department of Housing and Urban Development will administer the program.

FEDERAL TAX INCENTIVES

The major features of the Federal tax package are: A nonrefundable investment tax credit for capital investments in an Enterprise Zone. For personal property, such as machinery or equipment, this credit will be 5 percent. For the construction or rehabilitation of commercial, industrial, or rental housing structures within a zone, the credit will be 10 per cent. Unused investment tax credits may be carried over for the life of the zone or 15 years, whichever is longer.

A nonrefundable 10 percent income tax credit to employers for payroll paid to qualified zone employees in excess of payroll paid to such employees in the year prior to zone designation.

A special strengthened, nonrefundable 5 percent income tax credit to employers for wages paid to zone employees who were disadvantaged individuals when hired.

A nonrefundable 5 percent income tax credit to employees for wages paid to zone employees for wages earned in zone employment.

The elimination of capital gains taxed within the zones.

The designation of suitable Enterprise Zone areas as Foreign Trade Zones, providing relief from tariffs and import duties.

The continued availability of Industrial Development Bonds (IDBs) to small businesses in Enterprise Zones when the availability of such bonds is terminated elsewhere after 1986, and use of accelerated cost recovery for IDB financed property.

A carryover of any unused employment tax credits for the life of the zone in which a firm is located or 15 years, whichever is longer, and a carryback of up to three years.

COST AND EFFECT OF THE TAX PACKAGE

The Administration estimates that the cost of the Enterprise Zone program in FY 1984 would be $87 million, since tax incentives would effect taxable years beginning after January 1, 1984; and the cost in terms of foregone revenues would be $400 million in FY 1985, when it is assumed that the increased business activity would have occurred in any event elsewhere. The total cost of the program would then increase commensurately in future years for increased numbers of zones. When, however any of the business activity is new and would not have occurred otherwise, the net cost will be substantially reduced.

FEDERAL REGULATORY RELIEF

Under this proposal, Federal regulatory bodies (all agencies covered by the Administrative Procedures Act) will be given discretionary authority to relax or eliminate their nonstatutory regulatory requirements within Enterprise Zones, but only upon the request of the State and local governments.

To utilize this authority, the State and local governments governing each zone must request Federal agencies to relax of eliminate particular regulations within the zone. The Federal bodies that promulgated the regulations will have the statutory power to grant such requests at their discretion. Congressionally mandated standard will dictate how the agencies use this discretion. The standards will include an instruction to each body to weigh the special job creation and economic revitalization purposes of the zones against other important aspects of the public welfare which may underlie the regulation, and to relax or eliminate each particular regulation within the zone when appropriate. A Federal regulatory body will have no authority to take any action without a prior request from both the State and local governments governing each zone.

Regulations which are specifically proposed and spelled out by statute will not be affected by this authority. The minimum wage law, for example, will not be affected, since the statute expressly reguires that a minimum of $3.35 an hour be paid. The authority will only be used to relax regulations where agencies now have some discretion. Regulations affecting civil rights or the relaxation of which would harm the public safety or health, including environmental health, will be exempted from this authority.

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT ROLE

The Enterprise Zone program is not simply a Federal Government effort. To be successful, the program must have substantial contributions from State and local governments. In fact, State and local contributions may make the critical difference as to whether a zone succeeds or fails.

The proposed State and local contributions will determine which zones will be Federally approved. The Federal posture towards these contributions will be highly flexible. No particular element of tax relief or regulatory relief, or any other possible contributions will be required. Failure to include one element in a State and local package or contributions can be offset by greater strength in the other elements. It should be remembered, however, that each State and local contribution package will be competitively evaluated against the other State and local packages.

In the area of tax relief, State and local governments may provide reductions in State and local income taxes, property taxes, sales taxes, and other taxes which vary among the jurisdictions.

State and local deregulation may be provided in such areas as zoning, occupational licensure laws, usury laws, price controls, permit requirements, central planning regulations, and building codes.

It the area of service improvement, "contracting out" or "privatization" may be one means of improving local services, along with increased police or fire protection or street or sewer repairs.

State and local governments may also provide funding for projects which contribute to economic development in a zone, such as job training or infrastructure improvements. These governments may use their Community Development Block Grants, Urban Development Action Grants, or Revenue Sharing funds for these efforts.

To encourage local community involvement, State and local governments may encourage the creation of enterprise associations by zone residents. These associations may undertake the provision of some city services in their areas; help local residents to participate in the economic success of the zones, particularly through mechanisms providing for equity participation; and support volunteer, self-help efforts for the zone areas. Participation in the program by other private sector organizations in performing these functions may also be encouraged by the State and local governments. The extent to which residents of the zone have a stake in the success of the zone will be an important factor in the Federal designation competition.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, on rollcall No. 4, I was unavoidably absent because of a meeting with Secretary of the Interior, William P. Clark. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye."●

A TRIBUTE TO THEODORE A. SWINARSKI

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I call attention to a respected citizen from Illinois Fifth Congressional District, which I am privileged to represent, and he is Ted Swinarski. Ted, a lifelong Democrat, has served in various offices of city, county and State government for many years. His political career began as a precinct captain of the 12th Ward Regular Democratic Organization.

Ted was elected to the Illinois House of Representatives, Fourth district, in 1948 and served continuously in that post for seven terms. In 1982, he defeated the challenge of the incumbent alderman for committeeman by a margin of almost 3 to 1.

Swinarski was appointed secretary and treasurer of the Cook County Forest Preserve District in 1956 and served in this capacity until 1958. In 1958, Swinarski was appointed clerk of the Superior Court of Cook County, to fill a vacancy. In 1960, he ran for reelection to this office and received one of the highest vote totals ever recorded for county office.

In 1964, legislative enactment abolished the elective office, of the clerk of superior court and merged it into one elected office, which was clerk of the Circuit Court of Cook County, to administer that chancery and divorce divisions of the circuit court. He served in this position until 1982.

In 1969, he ran for the office of State senator, for the 25th District for the State of Illinois and was elected for the term of office.

Throughout his tenure as committeeman, Mr. Swinarski has always maintained a full-time office staff to provide assistance to the residents of the 12th ward. Numerous youth activities were initiated by Ted Swinarski,—among them—youth achievement awards, an annual bicycle safety parade, an annual Christmas party for children, a Halloween art contest, junior olympics, and sponsorship of many basketball, football, baseball, and swim teams. He has also provided assistance, without charge, to senior citizens of the 12th ward by offering various services, such as high blood pressure testing, preparation of homestead exemption and circuit breaker forms, Social Security information and crime prevention seminars. He has assisted many deserving young students in obtaining scholarships to further their educational goals.

Ted is also a member of many civic and fraternal organizations including, the Moose, Lions, Elks, Archer Avenue Kiwanis, Knights of Columbus, and the P.N.A.

I join with the residents of the Fifth Congressional District in paying tribute to Theodore A. Swinarski for his tireless work in our behalf.●

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH THE RADIO MACCABEE PROGRAM OF RADIO LIBERTY

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation which would authorize $3 million for the establishment of Radio Maccabee, a radio program under the auspices of Radio Liberty which would broadcast in the Russian language to the Jewish population of the Soviet Union.

As my colleagues know, the situation in the Soviet Union is growing worse for its almost 3 million Jews. Emigration, which totaled over 50,000 in 1979, has fallen to less than 1,000 last year. Each passing day brings with it news reports indicating an increase in state sanctioned anti-Semitism and the arbitrary detention of those who seek to practice their religion.

While Radio Liberty broadcasts in many languages to the various nationalities which compose the Soviet Union, it does not have a separate service for the Jewish population. Instead, it broadcasts a limited amount of information over its Russian Service which, while of high quality, is inadequate to meet the needs of the victims of oppression.

Radio Maccabee is therefore essential to fight against increased attempts to eradicate Jewish cultural life in the Soviet Union. It takes name from the great Jewish warrior family of Maccabee which led the fight against the repression of the Jewish religion by the Seleucid empire between 175 and 164 B.C. Their success in rededicating the Jewish temple is commemorated annually in the holiday known as Hanukkah. Like the Seleucid rulers, the Soviets must face resistance to their policies which are intent upon preventing Jewish culture to be transferred to the youngest generation, thereby spelling its demise in the next century.

Radio Maccabee would be directed to produce programs of general cultural, intellectual, political, and religious interest to the Soviet Jewish population, as well as Hebrew education courses. Particular attention would be devoted to ensuring that the needs and concerns of the activists as well as the refusnik population are met. It is meant to supplement and not replace any existing programs broadcasted over Radio Free Liberty.

As long as emigration is stifled, Jewish cultural support must be a high priority. With growing Soviet interference over telephone and postal communications, it is important that radio broadcasting be increased to provide Jewish information and education to Soviet Jews. This will be the messenger of hope for those who seek to preserve their culture.●

OHIOAN WINS NINTH MARINE CORPS MARATHON

HON. MICHAEL G. OXLEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Speaker, while many of my colleagues were back home in their districts the Sunday before last November's elections, an important event took place here in Washington, DC. It was on that day, November 4, 1984, that the Ninth Annual Marine Corps Marathon was run.

I am proud to draw to the attention of my colleagues the fact that this year's Marine Corps Marathon was won by a resident of my congressional district—29-year-old Brad Ingram, 966 Maumee Avenue, Mansfield, OH.

The difficulty of Brad's accomplishment can be appreciated by long-distance runners, neighborhood joggers and nonrunners alike. The race is a grueling one, to say the least. Just to finish the 26-plus mile course is a real feat. But to beat out the more than 10,000 other runners who attempted the race, as Brad did, took not solely physical stamina, but emotional strength and just plain guts. Brad's time of 2:19:39 was truly impressive.

It is a pleasure and an honor to represent such a fine athlete as Brad Ingram in the U.S. House of Representatives. I know all my colleagues in the House join with me in congratulating Brad on his outstanding athletic accomplishment.●

EXTEND THE MILK DIVERSION PROGRAM

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, as we begin the 1st session of the 99th Congress, I think it is most fitting to review one of the legislative success stories of the 98th Congress—the Milk Diversion Program.

Just a little more than a year ago, we passed compromise dairy legislation to address the serious surplus production problem facing the dairy industry. The cornerstone of that compromise was the Voluntary Incentive/Diversion Program I and several of my Wisconsin colleagues introduced in February 1983.

At the time the compromise was passed, there were many who were skeptical about how this voluntary, producer-financed program would work. Now, after 12 months, there is little doubt of its success.

In 1984, the Commodity Credit Corporation purchased slightly more than 8 billion pounds—milk equivalent—of surplus dairy products—less than half the purchases of the previous marketing year. This resulted in a savings of over $1 billion to the taxpayers in fiscal year 1984 alone.

Regrettably, the Diversion Program will end on March 31—6 months prior to the commencement of whatever new dairy program may be in the 1985 farm bill. In the interim, the only program available to our dairy producers will be two $0.50 per hundredweight price cuts.

That means that, in the space of a single year, dairy farmers will face three separate programs. This, in conjunction with all of the other changes made in the Dairy Price Support Program from 1981 to 1983, is clearly unreasonable. Without program continuity, farmers simply cannot make necessary business decisions.

Further, if experience has taught us anything in the last 4 years, it is that price freezes and price cuts, alone, provide no incentive to farmers to reduce production.

Accordingly, I am introducing legislation to extend the Voluntary Diversion Program for 6 months—from April 1 to September 30—until the end of the current farm bill for those producers who are currently enrolled in the program. Participation would be under the same terms and conditions as the original program and strictly voluntary—those producers who do not want to sign up for a 6-month extension do not have to.

The bill would also eliminate the Secretary's authority to make two additional $0.50 per hundredweight price cuts on April 1 and July 1. Given the success of the diversion and promotion programs, that authority is clearly no longer necessary.

I encourage my colleagues to cosponsor this important legislation that would maintain continuity in the dairy program for our farmers and retain the current levels of reduced dairy production in our country.●

INTRODUCTION OF HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 32

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, it is a distinct honor to join with my colleagues today from the House and Senate in the bipartisan introduction of House Concurrent Resolution 32, a bill designed to define a true budget freeze.

Although this is the 4th straight year in which I've joined in calling for an across-the-board spending freeze, today's introduction of House Concurrent Resolution 32 is perhaps the most important action taken to date by Members of Congress interested in passing such a spending freeze in Congress.

Why the importance of House Concurrent Resolution 32? Two reasons:

First, the time has come to clarify and redefine precisely the meaning of a budget freeze. This definition can be found in the body of House Concurrent Resolution 32.

Second, this bipartisan, bicameral introduction of House Concurrent Resolution 32 marks the first time that the growing support for the budget freeze being expressed this year by liberals and conservatives alike can be channeled into a worthwhile legislative vehicle.

The budget freeze must be redefined. At the time I first wrote to President Reagan in 1981 urging that he send a frozen or leveled budget to the Congress, I did my utmost to ensure that he and the Congress had a clear definition of what I meant by a fair, across-the-board budget freeze. Since that time, other Members of Congress and the White House combined have formulated literally dozens of complicated freezes—containing hundreds of modifications, loopholes, and formulas—all under the guise of a budget freeze. In short, their plans represent a meltdown.

I am here today to say that a freeze is a freeze is a freeze.

To be fair, fiscally responsible, and politically palatable, a budget freeze must be evenhanded and across the board. No exceptions, including the Department of Defense. No category, no function, no program, no individual receiving money from the Federal Government can be excluded from the budget freeze. With a true, across-the-board budget freeze, there are no sacred cows.

Today's introduction of House Concurrent Resolution 32 is truly important for political reasons as well. Anytime you see the likes of DENNY SMITH, CHUCK GRASSLEY, JOE BIDEN, MAX BAUCUS, NANCY KASSEBAUM, and TOM TAUKE in the same room in total agreement on a plan to cut the budget deficit by $35 billion, political history is being made.

We Republicans and Democrats can work together to solve our deficit crisis in a fair and even-handed manner. It is our intention to update and expand House Concurrent Resolution 32 into a complete First Concurrent Budget Resolution for fiscal year 1986 when he Congressional Budget Office formulates its new baseline and economic assumptions, expected in February of this year.●

DANTE FASCELL'S 30 YEARS IN CONGRESS

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay special tribute to my good friend and colleague, Representative DANTE FASCELL.

Recently Richard G. Capen, publisher of the Miami Herald, wrote a column praising Chairman FASCELL's accomplisments in his 30 years in Congress. I, too, would like to thank my Chairman for all he has done for South Florida and the United States.

South Florida is proud to have DANTE FASCELL representing its interests in Congress. We are proud to have DANTE FASCELL as our colleague. America should be proud to have DANTE FASCELL as a framer of its foreign policy.

For the benefit of my colleagues, the column follows:

[From the Miami Herald, Dec. 2, 1984]

FASCELL: CONSUMMATE CONGRESSMAN

You'd think that a politician who has just been overwhelmingly re-elected to a 16th term in Congress might be tempted to coast momentarily. Not Dante Fascell.

The morning after Election Day he was off to Europe as chairman of a congressional delegation to the NATO North Atlantic Assembly. [Among other accomplishments on the two-week trip, he successfully lobbied for increased defense-spending commitments among our allies there.]

Since returning from these key NATO sessions, he has discussed legislative priorities with a home-builders' group, worked to help save South Dade's Deering Estate from developers, and given three speeches in South Florida. He also managed a visit with his newest grandchild, born while he was out of the country.

As chairman of the key House Foreign Affairs Committee (HFAC), Congressman Fascell spoke late last week with the newly elected chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee—Richard Lugar, R-Ind.—to encourage a bipartisan approach on U.S. foreign-policy matters. Tomorrow Fascell returns to Washington as a principal in the Democratic Party's organizational caucus on Capitol Hill. On Wednesday he'll return to Miami to chair a panel discussion on U.S. Central American policy.

Too many South Floridians forget that Dante Fascell—who has done so much for this region—is a major player on today's national scene. After more than 28 years of distinguished service on the HFAC, he has earned his slot as a top congressional leader. I think we often overlook—or take it for granted—the importance of his accomplishments and the truly national signifiance of his assignment.

Well known as a practical, hard-working legislation, Dante Fascell is on the schedule of foreign ambassadors, heads of state, and senior U.S. State Department officials. His common-sense thinking on a broad spectrum of complex international issues is highly respected at home and abroad.

He is an expert on Latin American problems and is strongly committed to protecting human rights. Since 1976 he has chaired the Helsinki Commission, a joint congressional-Executive Branch panel that monitors Soviet-bloc compliance with human-rights agreements.

As a consummate congressman, he manages a careful balance between international duties and constituent demands. He has an amazing ability to rub shoulders with world leaders one day and to flip hamburgers at his annual Tropical Park picnic the next.

Dante Fascell's mark on South Florida has been substantial: Biscayne (Bay) National Park, Federal funds for repair and replacement of the Keys bridge system, acquisition of Government-owned land for Metrozoo, Port of Miami expansion, Federal reimbursement for state aid to Caribbean refugees, and increased Federal law-enforcement assistance for South Florida.

He has taken strong leads on such issues as nuclear nonproliferation, the War Powers Act, strong support for Israel, and expansion of Radio Free Europe, Radio Marti, and Radio Liberty.

Fascell is a master of political negotiation. "I want to get things done around here," he says. According to one of his colleagues, the South Floridian has "an instinctive sense of where the middle lies and how to get there."

Florida Congressman Larry Smith considers Fascell his mentor. "Dante is a tremendous national asset right here in Dade County. He has every bit the credentials of a Secretary of State—and more. Congressman Bill Lehman puts it this way: "Dante is a man of absolute integrity. He's an inspirational leader and a man of his word."

Fascell, whose parents were Italian-immigrant dairy farmers, came to Miami from New York in 1925 at age 8. "As the first-born, I was expected to be musical, and I got stuck with the violin," he recalls. Though Fascell never became a concert violinist, his musical skills did help pay his way through the University of Miami, where he played in a dance band.

In 1954, Fascell started his congressional career with a strong plea for our nation to "sell itself abroad rather than let Russia move in." That concern continues today. "If we are not out in the world giving our message, we will lose out," Fascell warns.

"We're simply not telling our story." That's why he has worked vigorously for three decades to obtain Federal funds for programs dedicated to spreading the message of freedom around the globe.

During the next Congress, Fascell hopes to play a role in developing a bipartisan foreign policy. He already has sent such a message to the Reagan Administration. "Too much is at stake otherwise," he says. "It's going to take the best of all of us if we are going to survive the nuclear age. That's the greatest issue of our time."

Dante Fascell believes our country was founded on the principle of service and sacrifice. He ought, to know; As this area's distinguished leader in Congress, he has given an abundance of each for more than 30 years.

South Florida—and our country—could not ask for a more-dedicated public servant.●

NEED FOR SOLIDARITY WITH THE POLISH PEOPLE

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, events in Poland in recent months have generated worldwide concern. While progress has been made, recent events threaten human rights in that country. It is clear that the United States and our allies must continue to apply pressure on the Polish government on behalf of the Polish people.

Amnesty was granted in August 1984 to all political prisoners. This amnesty was a significant step and progress has continued. Just last month Piotr Mierzewski and Bogdan Lis, two leading Solidarity spokesmen were released. Subsequent to these actions the United States has eased sanctions against Poland. The most important step has been the U.S. decision to remove our objection to Polish membership in the International Monetary Fund.

However, not everything is rosy in Poland. While there has been a limited easing of internal tensions, relations between the Government and the people of Poland have been volatile and full of broken promises. While some Poles are released, the Polish Government threatens a new crackdown. The most shocking violation of trust was the murder of Father Jerzy Popieluszko, an outspoken, pro-Solidarity Catholic priest. Officials in the Interior Ministry confessed to the abduction and to the killing of Father Popieluszko, and are on trial. The tragic death of Father Popieluszko has brought to light threats and abductions against other Poles.

The reaction among Poland's labor and human rights activists has been peaceful but pronounced. Human rights monitoring committees have been formed to monitor police violence. The Government has responded to these groups and to peaceful demonstrations with force; these groups have been threatened and foreign journalists have been threatened with prosecution if they attended events held by these monitoring committees. As my colleagues are well aware, the peaceful demonstration last December in Gdansk to commemorate those Polish workers killed during the 1970 worker strikes was forcefully dispersed by the Polish militia and the secret police. Clearly these actions are a retreat from the progress in Poland with respect to human rights.

Mr. Speaker, I recognize the domestic and international pressures which Poland faces. However, we cannot use these threats as an excuse to remain silent on human rights abuses in Poland. Just as the House has spoken out on abuses in the Soviet Union, South Africa and Central America, so too must we speak out against the threats and violence against the Polish people. For this reason I and 89 of our colleagues are introducing today a concurrent resolution to express the support of the Congress for the Polish human rights monitoring committees as well as for the peaceful gestures made by the Poles insisting that they will no longer tolerate suppresssion and intimidation tactices made by the Government. Congress has a responsibility to express its support and sympathy for their cause and for the nonviolent manner in which the Polish people are resisting this repression. I urge my colleagues to join in support of this resolution. I hope that the full House will consider this important human rights issue in a timely fashion.

On December 13, 1984, the 3-year anniversary of the imposition of martial law in Poland, the AFL-CIO and the Polish American Congress sponsored the U.S. premiere of the Tom Stoppard film, "Squaring the Circle." In conjunction with this event, AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurer Thomas R. Donahue and Solidarity representative Waclaw Adamczak spoke. Both gentlemen eloquently brought home the need for continued U.S. action and the problems facing the Polish people. At this time I would like to share with my colleagues the statements of Messrs. Donahue and Adamczak.

STATEMENT OF AFL-CIO SECRETARY-TREASURER THOMAS R. DONAHUE TO THE SOLIDARNOSC RECEPTION

I am delighted, on behalf of the AFL-CIO, to welcome all of you to our headquarters on this special day.

It was three years ago today that General Jaruzelski imposed martial law on the Polish people, outlawed Solidarnosc, and arrested thousands of trade union activists.

Clearly this is not an event to be celebrated. But it is an occasion to be marked by a reaffirmation of our support for the brave men and women of Poland who, guided by the irrepressible spirit of Solidarity, continue to struggle for an added measure of democracy, human rights and free trade unionism.

Today that struggle is expressed in countless forms—cultural and educational organizations, underground publishing houses, church activities, mutual aid societies, and, of course, the underground Solidarity movement—and it involves tens of thousands of people.

To all of them we have a moral obligation not only to lend material support but to serve notice on the Polish government that it cannot expect economic assistance from the people of the United States so long as it continues to oppress its own people.

For those who formulate the foreign policy of the United States government, the question of Poland may be fraught with ambiguity. But for the AFL-CIO, our task is clear: it is to respond as fully as we can to the needs of the workers of Poland—just as we seek to respond to the needs of the workers of South Africa, El Salvador and Chile.

This evening you would have been welcomed here by President Kirkland, but he is in Brussels attending an Executive Board meeting of the Executive Board of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, where the issues of South Africa and Poland are being discussed.

We have just received word that President Kirkland and a delegation from the ICFTU attempted today to deliver to the Polish Embassy in Brussels a statement in support of workers rights in Poland and demanding restoration of trade union rights. The delegation was turned away from the Embassy.

In Warsaw today, Solidarity founder Lech Walesa called for "open action" to revive free trade unions in Poland and said his banned trade union was still alive.

"I call on all union activists to take up this action now," Walesa said. "Solidarity is alive. It is a big national movement striving for the respect of human rights and the dignity of every man in Poland." Reviewing the situation in Poland since the December 13, 1981, clampdown, Walesa said: "The last three years revealed a complete bankruptcy of those who imagined that in Poland, one can bring about changes without the aid of the people."

In a clandestine broadcast Wednesday evening, which was jammed by the authorities, Solidarity called the clampdown "Black December" and said the government had "little to be proud of."

But the Communist Party newspaper defended the clampdown and said "The application of instruments of martial law were efficient."

Tonight in America, we pledge our voice will not be stilled in support of the sentiments Walesa expressed.

We are here this evening to see, for the first time in the United States, a remarkable motion picture about the struggle of Solidarnosc and its leader Lech Walesa. It is all the more remarkable as the first film ever written by the world-renowned playwright, Tom Stoppard.

It is called "Squaring the Circle," and it is also being premiered today in Chicago, under the sponsorship of the Polish American Congress. Stoppard took the title from a speech in his play which likens the geometric impossibility of squaring a circle within the same area to the impossible dream of a free trade union surviving in a totalitarian Marxist State.

We are fortunate, on this day of Solidarity with Solidarnosc, to have with us a member of the National Commission of Solidarnosc, Waclaw Adamczak. He is an economist and was co-author of Solidarnosc's economic program. He comes from Poznan, was jailed for eight months, was released in July of 1982 and now resides in the United States and works for the Committee in Support of Solidarity.

REMARKS BY WACLAW ADAMCZAK, MEMBER OF THE COMMITTEE IN SUPPORT OF SOLIDARITY IN NEW YORK.

Distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen: On behalf of the Committee in Support of Solidarity, I would like to express our gratitude for your support of solidarnosc, and for continuing to uphold the cause of the polish people.

The screening of Tom Stoppard's play, which you are sponsoring today, is yet another example of your efforts to remind the American people about our struggle for freedom and the preservation of human dignity. I hope that you will forgive me for taking exception to one sentence printed in the invitation to this event, It says that Stoppard's drama is about the rise and fall of solidarity. It is true that with the imposition of marital law in Poland exactly three years ago Solidarnosc has fallen on hard times, but it has not fallen!

The squaring of the circle did not stop on December 13, 1981. The continuing struggle of the solidarity underground, of the democratic opposition, indeed of the whole Polish society has consistently forced the rulers of Poland to wrestle with the dilemma posed by the first free trade union in the Communist world. Even the most recent events have demonstrated that three years of Communist-military rule have failed to solve the political and economic crisis in Poland. In fact, General Jaruzelski lost even in his attempt to wrap his unquiet people in a blanket of silence, to make the Polish crisis invisible so that he could pretend before the West that Poland has returned to normal. Every time he has made a gesture to reassure Western democracies that it would be all right to resume normal economic and political relations with his government, a cry of the oppressed rises from behind his back.

The murder of Father Popieluszko in the hands of the secret police—in a police state—is but the latest and best known incident. During the last three years there have been many others. Over sixty people have been killed in Poland by the security forces. Some were shot in the streets, others were murdered in secret, just like Father Popieluszko. You all know about the arrests, harassment of opposition activists, dismissals from jobs, and other repressive actions taken against anyone who refuses to remain a silent, obedient subject of the Government; against people who continue to oppose the destructive policies of the Government.

What you may not know is that the police and security forces are not the only instruments of the Jaruzelski regime in its attempt to still the Polish society. Equally, it is using economic policies for the purpose of repression. The disorganization of the economy, shortages of food and basic consumer goods, Government's labor practices, and the entire system of distribution are used to punish the society for its rebelliousness, for its stubborn demand that people be given a voice in the conduct of their own affairs.

Therefore nobody should be fooled by the diplomatic signals the regime is sending to the west, or by the solemn expression of concern and sorrow which the General adopts for the benefit of gullible foreign journalists. So long as the political and economic repression in Poland continues, no amount of aid can help the Polish people; it can only be used to support and strengthen the very regime which is responsible for Poland's present situation.

The Stoppard play presents the history of solidarity in 1980 and 1981 as a high political drama. I know that you will appreciate its concern, its sympathy for the aspirations of the Poles, and its occasional humor. Let me just make this plea for Solidarity and for Poland: Remember that the card game that you will see in the film is played not with a deck of cards but with the lives and hopes of a wounded, oppressed, and enslaved people who nevertheless have not been defeated. Let each of us do what he or she can to help them in their noble struggle. Thank you very much.●

DEFENSE PETROLEUM RESERVE

HON. WILLIAM M. THOMAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise to encourage my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring legislation to create a Defense Petroleum Reserve assuring emergency supplies for our defense forces.

Today, the Department of Defense needs about 50,000 barrels per day [b/d] of fuel for peacetime operations. Demand would increase to between 2 and 2.5 million b/d during a multiple-theatre, full mobilization conflict. As the past decade and a half illustrates, military fuel supplies can become tenuous in both peacetime and during full mobilization.

Part of our past planning for emergency military needs has included the development of our Naval Petroleum Reserve [NPR] system. The largest part of that system, Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 1—Elk Hills—lies within my Congressional District. While Elk Hills can supply 4 percent of DOD's current wartime and 16 percent of the Department's peacetime requirements, continued production will reduce the Reserve's value so that, for example, only 5 percent of DOD's peacetime needs could be supplied in the year 2000. Shutting in Elk Hills is not the solution either. Not only would it take 6 to 12 months to bring Elk Hills back to full production, but ultimate recovery from the reserve could diminish by as much as 37 to 110 million barrels of currently recoverable reserves, according to estimates I have seen.

The alternative I propose is simple: Construct a dedicated facility with a minimum drawdown capacity of 3 million barrels per day. The bill I am introducing creates a Defense Petroleum Reserve having the energy equivalent of 100 million barrels of crude oil in total storage. Generally, supplies would be available for use for emergency national defense purposes identified by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and would only be released on a Presidential declaration of an emergency.

To fund this reserve, the bill generally sets aside 50 percent of the proceeds from sale of the U.S. share of Naval Petroleum Reserve petroleum, the U.S. royalties on such production and of other revenues the United States may derive from NPR operations.

At the same time, this bill allows more prudent production of our current Naval Petroleum Reserve system by ending the 3-year cycle that currently affects NPR operations. Instead of considering whether to shut in fields, risking loss of crude oil resources, the United States could efficiently produce the Naval Petroleum Reserves in return for construction of a rapid drawdown facility dedicated to fueling our defense forces.

Mr. Speaker, before closing I want to make two things about this new bill quite clear. First, the Defense Petroleum Reserve allows the Department of Defense to develop the overall plan for the new Reserve, and the Department would be free to employ more than one storage site so long as it followed the guidelines for plan development required by the bill. Second, the bill provides authority for the acquisition of various kinds of facilities. I would expect such authority to be used only in cases of dire need. As the United States has a significant amount of refining and other fuel processing capacity, there appears to be no need to use such authority today, and it is provided largely as a precaution.

Again, I hope my colleagues will join me in cosponsoring this important bill. A dedicated facility offering our armed forces emergency energy supplies will improve our military's readiness and help eliminate some of the uncertainties the Defense Department faces in trying to ensure fuel is available when needed.●

CHILD HEALTH REVOLUTION

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, amidst the tragic and sobering news about famine in Africa comes some good news which we should not overlook. The U.N. Children's Fund [UNICEF] 1985 report points the way to saving 7 million children each year.

UNICEF has discovered the elements of what amounts to a child survival revolution. They include oral rehydration salts, breast feeding, growth charts, and expanded immunization.

What is amazing about the UNICEF plan is that it not only saves the lives of children, but also reduces population growth. UNICEF estimates that if its four point plan cuts the infant mortality rate in half in the next decade, world population would reach only 8.5 billion instead of a possible 10.5 billion.

Already, new child health programs have lowered child deaths and population growth in Columbia, Brazil, Algeria, Indonesia, Pakistan, Turkey, and elsewhere. But there is much more to do and a strong U.S. commitment to UNICEF can help ensure that the child health revolution does not fizzle. While the United States has pulled out of UNESCO, it should redouble its contribution to UNICEF.

Our food for peace donations program and help for UNICEF's child health revolution are the best foreign aid investments which we can make. The article below shows why UNICEF works.

The article follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Dec. 19, 1984]

FINDING A WAY AND THE WILL TO SAVE CHILDREN IN THE THIRD WORLD

(By David K. Willis)

One of the most urgent needs of the entire third world is to achieve what United Nations officials call a "child survival revolution"—fighting the ancient scourge of high mortality rates, especially among babies less than one year old.

Today comes some encouraging news that such a revolution might have begun, though the experts warn at once that much, much more remains to be done.

In a report entitled "The State of the World's Children 1985" and released in London, the UN Children's Fund (UNICEF) says:

An opportunity now exists "to save the lives of approximately 7 million children a year, and to protect the normal development of many millions more, at a cost which certainly does not exceed a fraction of 1 percent of the world's gross national product."

The lives of half a million children were saved in 1984 by using a simple, inexpensive method to combat dehydration, which is the single biggest cause of death among third-world infants.

Lowering infant death rates does not add to the third world's already severe overcrowding problems but actually helps reduce them. UNICEF's executive director, James P. Grant, argues that there will be no "surge in world population" if more children live:

"All the evidence suggests that a reduction in the number of child deaths would also help bring about a greater reduction in the number of child births," he says.

The greater the chance of a child surviving, Mr. Grant says, "the less the parents need to insure against loss by bearing more children than they actually want." Parents may space their children more widely, and educated women are more interested in family planning—two more reasons, UNICEF says, why overall birthrates will go down.

The new report even prints a diagram claiming that if infant mortality is cut in half in the next decade, world population would reach only 8.5 billion by the year 2100 instead of 10.5 billion as it says other UN figures indicate.

Other UN officials contacted in New York add a note of caution. The UN Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA) agrees that lower infant mortality rates do help reduce total birthrates, but it points out that other factors are also extremely important—raising the status of women, for instance.

"Certainly the experience in Kerala in India, and in Sri Lanka, has shown that falling child mortality rates were followed by lower population growth rates," says Jyoti Singh, a senior UNFPA official. "But many other things also have to happen: better health care for mothers and children, the ability of women to find work outside the home, women's literacy, and so on."

Officials say the 10.5 billion figure used in the UNICEF chart is the most optimistic of three variants cited by UNFPA: Given more pessimistic scenarios of progress, world population could reach 14 billion, even if progress is made in lowering infant mortality.

Nonetheless, UNICEF is encouraged that a significant start has been made toward allowing many more third-world children to live longer, and it sees a number of added benefits from the trend.

The fundamental issue is not medical or technical—it is one of perception and understanding, many UN officials say.

"We are talking about bringing about a mass ripening for change, about opening people's mental boxes in which habitual acceptance of a low level of health and a high rate of death among their children is locked up as socially or fatefully decreed inevitabilities," says UNICEF official Tarzie Vittachi.

"We are talking about transforming deeply inlaid attitudes and practices and helping people to see over the hill.

"What needs to be done then is to present new knowledge to people as a way to empower themselves to change their perception of 'normality' or 'inevitability.'"

Tony Hewett, another UNICEF official, says that one of the most urgent development needs in the third world is spreading the word that change is possible if people know where to go and what to do to find it.

"This is a time in history when the richer countries are somewhat disillusioned with 'development,'" he said in an interview in London.

"I know people have responded to the African famine, but recession and other constraints have generally acted to hold development budgets down and to reduce soft-loan World Bank lending," Mr. Hewett said.

"Now we have news of progress toward saving children's lives on a wide scale, at low cost."

The UNICEF report points to four elements in what it sees as its potential "revolution":

Teaching mothers to monitor the growth and feeding of their infants. Using a simple 10-cent growth chart could help eradicate half of all child malnutrition, UNICEF says.

Encouraging breast-feeding of infants whenever possible as the best nutrition a baby can have in its first six months of life.

Restoring salts and fluids to children suffering from diarrhea by using 10-cent packets of salt and sugar or homemade mixtures of the two. (UNICEF says it has distributed 65 million of these packets to 78 countries so far.)

Emphasizing the do-it-yourself aspect of these methods, UNICEF says they could be spread to half of the world's families in the next five years, saving the lives of about 2 million children every year.

An expanded program of immunization against six common diseases that the UN says kill or disable 10 million children a year.

UNICEF cites examples of new activity to lower child mortality in Colombia, Brazil, Algeria, Indonesia, Pakistan, Turkey, and elsewhere.

Mr. Hewett singles out a plan by President Belisario Betancur Caurtas of Colombia, due to be announced today, to reduce the national infant mortality rate from 57 per thousand to 40 per thousand in five years.

For comparison, the infant mortality rate in the United States was 10.9 per thousand in 1982.

In Britain the rate was about the same, but in Ethiopia it was 146 per thousand and in Sierra Leone, 206.

UNICEF works through local communities, Mr. Hewett emphasized.

"Development," he said, "is a process going on inside each one of us. We all strive for self-realization. . . . So do people in the third world—and they want to help their families by saving the lives of their children.

"We can help."●

INDIVIDUAL TRAINING ACCOUNTS ARE NEEDED MORE THAN EVER

HON. SHERWOOD L. BOEHLERT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, today we open the 99th Congress, but we have much unfinished business from the 98th. Our problems have not disappeared because of the arbitrary turn of a calendar page.

One continuing problem in my district, and in many areas of this Nation, is that of displaced workers—employees who have been laid off permanently because their skills have become obsolete.

A recent Labor Department report determined that 2 million displaced workers who lost their jobs between January 1979 and January 1984 are still without work. Many of those who have found new jobs are working for substantially lower pay.

In my own district, continuing industrial layoffs are causing a sharp rise in the unemployment rates of some counties.

These statistics should be a warning to all of us. We cannot sit back complacently and ignore the growing ranks of displaced workers. This problem is likely to get worse, not better, as the economy continues to adapt to high technology and international trade.

With that in mind, Congressman DICK DURBIN and I are reintroducing our National Individual Training Account Act today. Our bill already has 40 cosponsors including members of every wing of both political parties. And at hearings last year before the Banking Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization, our proposal was endorsed by several economists and Members of Congress.

The reasons for this broad support are clear. The bill addresses a real problem in an innovative, efficient way that promotes both individual initiative and employer-employee cooperation. And it builds on ideas used in the highly successful GI bill and individual retirement account programs.

The bill would allow workers to establish tax-free individual training accounts [ITA's] that they could then draw on to pay for retraining if they were laid off. The accounts would require equal contributions by the employer and the employee.

This simple program, which would create no new Government bureaucracy, could go a long way toward easing life for future displaced workers. And that would make for a smoother transition for our economy as a whole.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to cosponsor this bill and to join with me in pushing for its passage.●

A NEW SHIP CONSTRUCTION AND RECONSTRUCTION PROGRAM TO ENSURE ADEQUATE NATIONAL DEFENSE CAPABILITIES

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to amend title VII of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 to provide for the construction in U.S. shipyards of modern vessels with a dual commercial and military adaptability. The new ships would be paid for by the Department of Defense and sold or chartered to U.S. citizens for operation in the commerce of the United States. Vessel operators would be permitted to deposit their obsolete, but militarily useful ships into the National Defense Reserve Fleet to defray charter costs.

The single most important justification for the support of a U.S.-flag merchant fleet is the need to have strategic sealift resources available in time of war or national emergency. There is, of course, an economic justification for the merchant marine, but it is less well defined, and the rationale has been debated by economists within our own Government. On the other hand, the military necessity for a U.S.-flag merchant fleet for sealift purposes is indisputable.

In wartime, fully 90 percent of the supplies needed to support our troops must be carried by sea. Some estimates say two merchant vessels are needed to support a single gray hull or warship and the associated complement of Armed Forces committee ashore. In fact, this was the British experience in the Falkland Islands conflict. If we are to have a 600-ship Navy, then at a minimum, 1,200 merchant ships capable of acting as military auxiliaries will be necessary. At the present time, all sources considered, there are 1,100 militarily useful vessels available to our Nation should we need them. At first blush, the shortfall appears to be, at worst, modest, and one might ask, why the cause for alarm? A brief analysis of the sources of our military sealift exposes the fallacy of relying upon the estimate of 1,100.

Of these 1,100 ships 400 are pledged from NATO countries and would be unavailable in a non-NATO conflict. One hundred and eighty-three are aging vessels in the National Defense Reserve Fleet whose ability to perform is uncertain. Seventy-two are owned by U.S. citizens, but are operated under foreign flags and crewed by foreign crews whose allegiance may not lie with U.S. interests.

Considering these facts, it quickly becomes apparent that the fleet upon which we can depend is around 545 vessels, less than half the size we'd need in time of war, and this does not even take into consideration the ships required to supply everyday business and industrial needs. Nor does it consider battle casualties. Remember, we lost more merchant ships in World War II than we have in the entire U.S.-flag commercial fleet today. The facts bear out the shocking urgency of the situation. We have heard over and over again that the merchant marine is our "fourth arm of defense." It is frightening to think that this arm could not be raised in defense should it be needed.

Surely a commercially generated maritime rebirth would be preferable to a Government-financed ship construction program. If I thought that might happen, I would not stand before you today to ask for your support of this bill. The sad fact is commercial forces cannot and will not result in the construction of vessels with national defense relevance. Indeed, future construction of any commercial vessel in a U.S. shipyard is doubtful. Navy construction alone will not support our shipyards. It is time we faced this defense weakness head on—the problem is not prospective, the decline of our shipyard and labor base is a present one—the price of any further delay will be the loss of our already struggling shipyards and maritime labor base so necessary to the defense of our country.

My message is really a simple one. We need vessels in greater numbers, active shipyards, and a skilled labor base for our national defense. Our present capabilities fall short of our need. It is unlikely that commercial market demand will generate construction here in the United States and almost certainly will not result in the type of ships our defense strategy demands. Yet, we require these vessels just the same.

My bill would result in the construction of modern, efficient vessels capable of use both commercially and in time of war. They would replace older, less efficient tonnage which could move into the National Defense Reserve Fleet under the trade-in provision of the bill. The new vessels would be available for charter at rates which would permit them to compete in the U.S. foreign and domestic trades, but at rates sufficiently high so as not to unduly disadvantage existing U.S. operators in the same trade.

Although my program will entail some cost, if our national strategy of forward deterrence is to mean anything at all—we must have merchant vessels to support our Armed Forces. This is a legitimate cost of national defense and one which I believe we as taxpayers ought to be willing to pay. The Department of Defense, whose responsibility is the defense of our country, ought to be the source of funding for this program.

Clearly, the bill is not a panacea, but a realistic balm for an ailing defense industrial base, providing jobs, increased tax revenues to the Treasury, an improvement in the balance of payments, an infusion of militarily valuable vessels into the National Defense Reserve Fleet, and modern, economical defense relevant vessels into the active U.S.-flag merchant fleet. I urge my colleagues to support my bill and a new era of growth in our merchant fleet.●

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF DR. ALFRED GOTTSCHALK

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to commend Dr. Alfred Gottschalk for his dedication and accomplishments in his 25 years of service to the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati. His devotion to the Jewish community and the college, which he serves as president, has resulted in the development of extensive educational programs for the study of Reform Judaism, enhanced interreligious communication and understanding, and increased participation of women in the rabbinate.

Dr. Gottschalk has most recently been accorded the highest honor, that of giving the prayer at the beginning of the second inauguration for President Reagan on January 21, 1985.

Dr. Gottschalk was born in Oberwesel, Germany, in 1930. He came to America as a youngster with his parents, who fled the Nazi government.

He was ordained rabbi in 1957 after completion of studies at the New York and Cincinnati Schools of the College-Institute. The school, with campuses in Cincinnati, New York, Los Angeles, and Jerusalem is primarily a graduate institution that trains reform rabbis, cantors, educators, and communal workers.

Dr. Gottschalk's myriad activities have earned him numerous fellowships, degrees, and awards, including a Smithsonian Institution research grant in 1963, election as an Honorary Fellow of the Hebrew University, Jerusalem, in 1977, and the degree of L.L. D. from Xavier University in Cincinnati in 1981 after inaugurating Xavier's first chair of interreligious ecumenical studies. He has actively participated in many organizations related to both religious and secular causes. Currently, Dr. Gottschalk is a member of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council.

To be sure, the Jewish community in Cincinnati and throughout America has benefited from the enthusiasm and commitment of Dr. Gottschalk. But to laud him only for his accomplishments to the Jewish Reform movement would be less than complete. He has also sought to improve education, promote community service, and involve women in the leadership of the reform movement.

I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Dr. Gottschalk on his 25th anniversary with the Hewbrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion. We are fortunate to have a man of his character residing and working in our community.

His emphasis on creating greater understanding and harmony among people of all races and religions cannot be better stated than by Dr. Gottschalk himself, when he says, ". . . While we do not diminish our concern for the affairs of the general community and universal civilization. The two are interlocked and inseparable."●

LONG-DISTANCE TELEPHONE SERVICE

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, less than 10 days ago, more Americans made long-distance calls than at any other time of the year. For many who used the services of the competing long-distance telephone companies, those recent Christmas day calls were cheaper than ever before. Regrettably though, we cannot be sure that long-distance service will be available at competitive rates next Christmas.

In 1984, the American consumer struggled through a new process to order and obtain telephone service. In my opinion, the confusion and frustration experienced in the short run should give way to considerable benefits from the newly competitive telephone industry. Indeed, this was the very objective of the court-approved divestiture of AT&T's former local operating companies as well as the Federal Communication Commission's access charge decisions. These benefits are expected to take the form of, among other things, cost-based pricing, a greater range of telecommunications products and services and, most significantly, lower distance rates.

The divestiture and the extra burden imposed on the consumer could be without long-term benefit unless we in Congress, the Federal Communications Commission, the Department of Justice, and the courts ensure that competition continues within the long-distance telephone industry.

I want to call your attention to a recent editorial by the New York Times and more importantly, to the following comment by the head of one of the alternative long-distance telephone companies. (Both reprinted below).

Let's make every effort to support a growing competitive marketplace for all Americans who want to and need low cost telephone service. And let's make sure on Christmas day, 1985 and beyond, when millions and millions of Americans call their family and loved ones, that they will continue to save a little money because competition keeps their rates down.

[From the New York Times, Nov. 26, 1984]

GIVE AT&T SOME ROOM ON RATES

Like other public utilities, A.T.&T.'s long-distance phone rates are regulated to insure that its virtual monopoly does not generate excessive profits. But unlike other utilities, the company does compete directly with unregulated companies providing some of the same services.

That leaves A.T.&T. at a disadvantage when it comes to attracting the capital it needs for growth. Shewdly, it proposes a plausible remedy—a flexible rate of return that would not threaten either competing firms or phone customers. The idea might also be applicable to other utilities whose productivity is stifled by more traditional regulation.

Any company that wants to offer long-distance phone service may now do so at any price. But the Federal Communications Commission continues to control A.T.&T.'s rates, for the sound reason that it still has so much of the business that it could use price reductions to keep competitors from ever getting started. Until the F.C.C. decides that MCI, Sprint and a dozen other firms are able to compete on an equal footing, A.T.&T. must continue to seek approval for phone rates and show that they are needed to earn a fair return on the stockholders' capital.

That puts A.T.&T. in a difficult position. The loss of its monopoly makes the company's profits on long-distance service far more volatile. Its monthly returns on stockholders' equity have ranged this year from a meager 5.8 percent to a considerable 18.5 percent. The company fears that the commission might seize on temporary high profits to force its rates down too much. But judging from past experience, the company has reason to fear that it would not be quick to obtain higher rates if its profits were to fall below the sanctioned rate. It argues with some justification that the net result will be higher charges for the money it borrows in the financial markets.

A.T.&T. has therefore asked that the commission agree to a more flexible range of profit targets. Once granted what is considered a fair rate of return to stockholders, A.T.&T. would not be allowed to seek higher phone rates until its profit had fallen three percentage points below the target number. Similarly, the commission would not insist on lower phone rates until A.T.&T.'s return on equity exceeded the target by at least three points.

That approach would not solve the harder problem of determining a fair return for a company poised so awkwardly between competition and monopoly. But by letting A.T.&T.'s return fluctuate in the range common to other large industrial firms, the commission would eliminate one special obstacle to its financing, without exposing the public to monopoly pricing.

The hidden bonus is that such flexible returns for A.T.&T. could inspire similar experiments in industries selling electricity and natural gas, which come closer to being traditional regulated monopolies. It's long been understood that fixed returns reduce their incentives to improve efficiency. Utilities are discouraged from pursuing extra profits because they tend to be taken back the next time the regulators adjust their prices.

In proposing flexible return targets, A.T.&T. is serving its stockholders. By granting the request, the F.C.C. would be serving the public.

[From the New York Times, Dec. 13, 1984]

AT&T REACHES OUT FOR A NEW MONOPOLY

To the EDITOR:

I have several comments on your Nov. 26 editorial regarding A.T.&T.'s rate-of-return proposals before the Federal Communications Commission ("Give A.T.&T. Some Room on Rates").

While it is true that competition for long-distance service was promoted by the divestiture, non-A.T.&T. long-distance carriers still experience significant difficulties and shortcomings in the quality of access they receive from former A.T.&T. local telephone companies. The blunt truth is that even after so-called "equal access" is introduced, A.T.&T. will continue to enjoy major facility and service advantages over its competitors.

As your editorial points out, A.T.&T. has largely retained its monopoly position, holding on to approximately 90 percent of the long-distance market nationwide. This dominating monopoly position is the direct result of A.T.&T.'s historical position as a monopoly carrier and those disparities in "equal access" that continue to exist. Until A.T.&T. ceases to be a monopolist, rate-of-return regulation of A.T.&T.'s communications activities will be required to prevent abuses of its monopoly power.

Granting A.T.&T.'s requests for flexible rate-of-return targets is inconsistent with these observations. A.T.&T.'s proposal before the F.C.C. goes much farther than your editorial indicates. Its reasonable-latitude proposal is not really what A.T.&T. wants at all; what it wants—and has publicly stated—is immediate deregulation. Such deregulation would enable A.T.&T. to strangle competition entirely. In the meantime, it has settled on its flexible-return proposal as second best.

The competitive long-distance carriers oppose any proposal that would allow a unitary flexible rate of return for A.T.&T. to lump all its various long-distance services together in order to obtain a generalized rate of return that would not reflect real differences in cost and demand among services. A.T.&T. could then price certain price-sensitive services high, at the same time keeping the prices of services that are competitive artificially low, to undercut competitors.

The point is that a generalized rate of return would enable A.T.&T. to do this at will within a prescribed, flexible low end/high end rate variance. There would be no regulatory scrutiny to determine whether high-price services were, in fact, subsidizing low-price services.

Given A.T.&T.'s huge monopoly position, the threat of cross-subsidization is very real. In fact, the threat is so real that the F.C.C. must continue to require A.T.&T. separately to cost out not only its basic service offerings, but also individual services offered within service offering groups.

For example, the F.C.C. has determined that one of A.T.&T.'s message telephone service (M.T.S.) offerings, the so-called "block of time" calling feature, is priced so low that it is actually earning a rate of negative return. Very clearly, other M.T.S. services are subsidizing this feature, which is specifically directed at A.T.&T.'s long-distance competitors.

If this kind of anticompetitive behavior is allowed to continue, A.T.&T. can be expected to garner significant gains above and beyond its already huge market share. These gains would not result from the competitive excellence of A.T.&T.'s service offerings, but from the price leverage A.T.&T. is uniquely able to exert owing to its monopoly power.

In short, A.T.&T.'s rate proposal would yield it yet another means to consolidate its position as a continuing de facto monopolist. The ironic result would be an eventual return to the state of affairs the divestiture sought to remedy.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON CHILDREN, YOUTH, AND FAMILIES

HON. DAN COATS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution introduced today calling for the reauthorization of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families.

As a member of the committee since it began its important work 2 years ago, I can attest to the accomplishments that have been made toward documenting the circumstances currently affecting American families. The committee has held 25 hearings on diverse family topics such as child abuse, paternal absence, and juvenile delinquency. The goal of these hearings has been to establish a knowledge base for understanding the complex challenges facing families today. Five reports were issued that begin to yield a statistical portrait of demographic trends and social realities.

The task which still presents itself to this committee is to analyze the specific approaches, policies, and programs that strengthen or weaken family ties. What we have learned about the current realities of American family life serves as the context for our future work. We can now begin to test the appropriateness of some public sector initiatives based on our findings and ultimately make specific policy recommendations.

Much of the groundwork has now been laid. There is still however important work to be done. While differences exist, there is every reason to believe that the bipartisan efforts made to date will continue to the benefit of effective policymaking for children and families.●

GEORGE WILL DISCUSSES SOVIET ARMS CONTROL—THE AFGHANISTAN MODEL

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, all men and women of good will wish for unqualified success in the upcoming rounds of arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union. That success will be rendered impossible if the American people and our representatives at the bargaining table speak and act as if they were naive about the nature of our adversary. Indeed, proper arms control agreements become necessary just because of the nature of the Soviet regime: Britain, for example, also has nuclear weapons, yet the freedom-supportive and democratic character of British Government makes it unnecessary for us to seek such an agreement from Britain.

The real nature of any regime is understood not by its words alone but by its words in the context of its actions. I urge all those in the administration who are pushing for an arms control victory to meditate on George Will's revealing article on the way the Soviets have been treating the people of Afghanistan. George Will's column is based on reports from the human rights monitoring group, Helsinki Watch. It should be remembered that Helsinki Watch is an outgrowth of a previous United States-Soviet effort to stabilizing tensions, the Helsinki accords. The search for peace can never be separated from a consideration of the quality of that peace, and the ultimate question arms controllers must answer is whether an arms control agreement enhances U.S. freedom and security in the world.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 3, 1985]

AFGHANISTAN IS NOT IRRELEVANT

(By George F. Will)

The U.S. delegation to the Shultz-Gromyuko demi-summit has packed its shirts and socks and illusions (the socks and shirts are in suitcases; the illusions are in an enormous trunk), so this is a good time to notice a statement that recently issued from the president, a statement concerning a subject that arms controllers insist is irrelevant to arms control. The subject is Afghanistan. The president said continued Soviet butchery there is "a serious impediment to the improvement of our bilateral relations."

Now, that is simply untrue. The Reagan administration is so eager for "improved" relations ("improvement" means less friction, which means more U.S. passivity as the Soviet Union behaves as it always does) that when the president spoke to the United Nations last year, his reference to Afghanistan was so brief and limp that William Buckley said the president "made it seem as though the poor Afghans were suffering from chicken pox."

What the Afghans actually are suffering is reported in the current New York Review of Books, in an excerpt from a report from Helsinki Watch. That organization monitors compliance (where the Soviet Union is concerned, comprehensive noncompliance) with the Helsinki accords.

The report tells of the fate of two brothers, aged 90 and 95, both blind, who remained in their village when everyone else fled from a Soviet offensive last year. The Russians tied dynamite to their backs and blew them up.

Between 4 and 5 million Afghans (about one-third to one-fourth of the population; think of 60 million Americans) are refugees in Pakistan and Iran. They have fled because, the report says, "the crimes of indiscriminate warfare are combined with the worst excesses of unbridled state-sanctioned violence against civilians."

The authors of this report met an Afghan doctor who has lost 42 members of his family and had just learned that two had recently been burned alive. The authors collected abundant evidence of "civilians burned alive, dynamited, beheaded; bound men forced to lie down on the road to be crushed by Soviet tanks; grenades thrown into rooms where women and children have been told to wait. . . . From throughout the country come tales of death on every scale of horror, from thousands of civilians buried in the rubble left by fleets of bombers to a young boy's throat being dispassionately slit by a Soviet soldier."

* * * * *

The Sovietization of Afthanistan is advanced by ripping tens of thousands of children from their parents and sending them to the Soviet Union for "education." And of course there is the usual Soviet torture system: "Mothers were forced to watch their infants being given electric shocks. . . . A young woman who had been tortured in prison described how she and others had been forced to stand in water that had been treated with chemicals, which made the skin come off their feet."

A European doctor recently told The New York Times: "When an Afghan woman tells you she left home because Russian soldiers killed almost everyone in her village, including her children, you wonder. But over the months, when two dozen more Afghan women from various parts of the country come in with exactly the same story, it begins to seem inescapably true." But it has almost nothing to do with U.S.-Soviet relations.

The Reagan administration's deepest desire is for the Soviet regime—which has signed the U.N. Charter, the Geneva conventions and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights—to sign more arms agreements like the ones it is currently violating.

The arms control lobby will say that Afghanistan is irrelevant to the "imperative business" of arms control. But the arms control process rests on certain illusions about the fundamental dynamic and aims of the Soviet regime. That regime is revealing its essence daily in Afghanistan. It is a regime interested only in enhancing its military advantages and the political gains that flow therefrom. It successfully uses the arms control process only for that purpose.

On the U.S. side, that process rests on the radically false premise that the Soviet regime desires agreements that will codify a relationship of "live and let live." (The words are, astonishingly, those of Paul Nitze, special arms control adviser to Secretary Shultz.) The Soviet regime is not in the "live and let live" business.

As a last rhetorical resort—and sometimes as a first resort—arms controllers quote Churchill's famous formulation, "Better jaw-jaw than war-war."

That formulation is true, but hardly exhausts the alternatives, and ignores the fact that the Soviet regime regards jawing as a facet of warring. U.S. policy, illuminated by the light shed from burning Afghanistan, is: We jaw-jaw while they war-war.●

YEAR OF SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago, responding to a national crisis caused by the Great Depression and under the leadership of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, the Congress established the beginnings of our Social Security system.

Today, that system provides basic economic security for nearly 120 million working Americans and their families and pays benefits each month to nearly 37 million retired or disabled beneficiaries. One measure of this program's success is that without these benefits an additional 14 million Americans would have incomes below the poverty line.

In recognition that the Social Security Program is one of the most important and successful social programs in the history of our Nation, I have introduced House Joint Resolution 1 declaring 1985 to be the "Year of Social Security." I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting this resolution.●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE HONORABLE JOHN E. BOCKHORN, ESTEEMED CHIEF OF POLICE OF FRANKLIN LAKES, NJ, OUTSTANDING CITIZEN AND GREAT AMERICAN

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, January 18, the residents of Franklin Lakes, my congressional district and State of New Jersey will gather in testimony to the outstanding public service rendered to our community, State, and Nation by one of our most distinguished public safety officers, Hon. John E. Bockhorn, chief of the Franklin Lakes Police Department, good friend, leading citizen, and great American.

As Chief Bockhorn retires from his law enforcement career, I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in deep appreciation of all of his good works and share great pride in the success of his achievements with his good wife, Joan Mary; daughter, Nancy Lynn Cunningham; son, John E. Bockhorn, Jr.; and grandchildren Tarra Lynn Cunningham, Tommy Ellen Cunningham, Crystal Gale Cunningham, and John E. Bockhorn III.

Mr. Speaker, Chief Bockhorn has indeed earned the highest respect and esteem of all of us for the quality of his leadership and highest standards of excellence in seeking to achieve optimum public safety for all of our people. John Bockhorn was appointed to the Franklin Lakes police department on January 1, 1957. He rose through the ranks of the police department and on July 1, 1977, attained his present high office of public trust as chief of the department. He has announced his plan to retire as chief of police effective July 1, 1985.

Throughout his lifetime John Bockhorn has forged ahead with dedication, devotion, and sincerity of purpose in combating crime and protecting the life of our people. We applaud his knowledge, training, hard work, and personal commitment that has enabled him to achieve the fullest confidence and strongest support of the people of our community. He has always applied the most sophisticated and advanced techniques of his profession.

John Bockhorn has been a staunch supporter and active participant in many civic and community improvement programs and we applaud the quality of his leadership endeavors for almost three decades in the vanguard of our public safety officers.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed appropriate that we reflect on the deeds and achievements of our people who have contributed to the quality of life and way of life here in America and I am pleased to call your attention to John's lifetime of outstanding public service. As he retires his official leadership badge of courage and valor as the esteemed chief of police of Franklin Lakes, NJ, I respectively seek this national recognition of his contribution to our country in placing others above self in providing safety on the streets, security in the home, and optimum public safety for all of our people. We do indeed salute Chief John E. Bockhorn of Franklin Lakes, NJ, for his contribution to the quality of life for the people of our community, State, and Nation.●

HONORING DR. WALTER HANDFORD OF SOUTH CAROLINA

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to recognize the accomplishments of Dr. Walter E. Handford of Greenville, SC.

For 20 years, Dr. Handford has been the guiding force behind Southside Baptist Church, providing spiritual and moral leadership not only to the church, but to the entire community. When Dr. Handford came to Southside on January 1, 1965, the church consisted of 250 members. The church now has over 4,500 members with regular Sunday attendances running over 2,500. Pastor Handford has certainly made a positive impact on the community, State, and Nation, especially in providing real leadership in the Christian education movement across our country.

I consider it both an honor and a privilege to know Dr. Handford and offer him my sincerest congratulations on his 20th anniversary. I wish him many more successful and productive year with us in Greenville, and offer him the continued assistance of my office.●

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, during the 98th Congress I introduced H.R. 2601, a bill to amend the United States Code to authorize the imposition of the sentence of death for crimes of homicide, treason, and espionage.

Since that Congress did not pass any capital punishment provisions I have on this 1st day of the 99th Congress introduced legislation to allow for this penalty.

In 1972, virtually all of the death penalty statutes in the country were nullified by the U.S. Supreme Court with its landmark decision of Furman against Gerrgia. In that case, the Supreme Court stated that State death penalty statutes which leave to the unguided discretion of the jury or judge the determination of whether the death penalty should be imposed are unconstitutional.

In the decade since the Furman decision, two-thirds of the States have enacted laws to restore the availability of the death penalty as a sanction for the most serious crimes when committed under particularly reprehensible circumstances. During this same period, the Congress has on several occasions considered legislation to provide constitutional procedures that would permit the restoration of the penalty to the Federal criminal justice system, but with the exception of a death penalty provision included in antiaircraft hijacking legislation in 1974, no such statute has been passed by the Congress.

A substantial majority of the American public believes, as I do, that the imposition of the death penalty can and does act as a deterrent to violent and heinous crimes of homicide.

I would hope the 99th Congress will respect and reflect the wishes of its constituents and enact this death penalty statute.●

EXTENDING THE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION AND THE APPALACHIAN REGIONAL COMMISSION

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation providing a 3-year extension, through fiscal year 1988, for the programs under the Economic Development Administration [EDA] and the Appalachian Regional Commission [ARC].

The new bill would authorize $150 million each year for EDA's Public Works Grants Program under title I of the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1956 as amended. It would provide $45 million a year for the business loan program; $37 million for planning, technical assistance, and research and evaluation; and $50 million each year for long term and sudden and severe economic dislocation, and revolving loan funds, under title IX of PWEDA.

The new bill also amends and extends the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 as amended, to extend ARC's programs through fiscal year 1988. It would authorize $234 million, $250 million, and $270 million respectively for fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 for the Appalachian Highway Program. It would authorize $75 million each year for ARC's nonhighway programs.●

LAWRENCE J. SMITH

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 3, 1985

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to eliminate tax-free securities from the formula which determines the amount of Social Security benefits to be taxed. Under my bill, if these securities were held prior to April 19, 1983, the income from the securities would not be included. If securities were bought after April 19, 1983, then the income derived from the securities would be included in the formula.

The law now requires that up to one-half of Social Security benefits may be taxed. However, the formula devised to determine the taxability of these benefits includes income from tax-free securities. This was done with no warning to the elderly.

By including income from tax-free securities, Congress created a different class of taxpayers—taxpayers who must report income no other American must report.

Senior citizens believe they are now being penalized for saving for their retirement. They bought tax-free securities such as municipal bonds because of their nonreporting tax-exempt status. Now they have the rules changed for them, but not for anyone else.

I recognize that the Social Security's financial status required that benefits be taxed. In the past, however, Congress has always phased-in major changes.

My bill would permit such a phase-in period for the factors which make up the formula.●

SENATE—Monday, January 7, 1985

(Legislative day of Thursday, January 3, 1985)

The Senate met at 12 noon and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, they shall be filled.—Matthew 5:6.

Gracious Father in Heaven, we ask for Your blessing upon the significant events of this month which launch our Government into 4 years of unprecedented responsibility and opportunity. Recognizing the monumental issues which face Your servants in all branches of government, we pray for the overrule of Divine Providence in all the affairs of our Republic. Especially do we remember the critical Geneva Conference and ask for Your wisdom and guidance to all involved.

In our pluralism, dear Lord, may we see that it is not differences that threaten us but indifference. Thank You for differences which are of the very essence of all creation—for diversity from which comes beauty and harmony—the symphony of life. We thank You for the democratic system which honors these differences—protects them, sustains them, and serves them.

But great God, sensitize us to the peril of indifference—indifference to truth, to justice, to integrity, to peace—indifference to the abuse of power and to evil—indifference to the poor, the oppressed, the persecuted, the voiceless and powerless—indifference to God Himself. Forgive us Lord, deliver us, save us from godless indifference. In His name who was Love Incarnate. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished acting majority leader is recognized.

Mr. SIMPSON. Thank you, Mr. President pro tempore.

THANKS TO THE CHAPLAIN

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I thank the Chaplain for the tone of his prayer this morning. I think that is most appropriate. Indeed, we embark on a very important session soon.

Mr. President, I have no need for leader time. I have no particular gems to share with you this morning. Plenty of those will come in the future as we try to discipline ourselves toward legislating, which is what we are about or should be about.

I believe the Senator from Arizona wishes a portion of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank my friend from Wyoming.

THE DEFENSE BUDGET

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as I traveled around the country talking to different groups I constantly hear "cut the defense budget."

The other day at a Republican meeting downtown I heard many, many expressions from my brothers in the Republican Party "cut the defense budget."

Mr. President, I am chairman of the Armed Services Committee and I asked these people, "Where? Where do you want to cut defense?" I have yet to have an answer. Yet everybody in this body has some idea that we can balance the budget if we cut defense.

I am asking my brethren in this body to supply me with some answers, because I honestly feel that we might be able to cut defense. I am not married to the idea of a single budget figure. But I do need help. And I ask for your guidance.

For example, we have an area where cuts can be made if there are major reductions in the defense budget and that is the area of base closures. While base closures do not save much money in the first year, the savings in the outyears are substantial. The annual operating costs for a typical military base are about $100 million. There will actually be some slightly increased cost the first year to accomplish base closures, but after the first year if we can close, say, 10 bases, then we can save approximately $1 billion or more a year.

We all know that base closures and realignments such as these are possible and would save substantial sums. Politically, Mr. President, base closures are very traumatic and they will be fought tooth and nail. But if defense cuts are forced, I, for one, will be seeking to close military bases. In fact, I have already written the Secretary of Defense that that is going to be one of my objectives, to close bases around this country that we no longer need.

I will refer to one other area I have a great interest in and have had for many years, along with the Senator from Wisconsin, whom I see on the floor. We now have in air training the Air Force training pilots, the Army training pilots, and the Navy training pilots. We do not need that, Mr. President. We only need one training command, and I do not care who operates it.

All we have to teach the young men and women are how to take an airplane off, land it, do it at night, and fly under instruments. After that, it is up to the individual services.

One closing example. Again, the Senator from Wisconsin has been helpful to me on this. We now train all of our helicopter pilots at Fort Rucker, except the Navy. And the Navy, for some reason, thinks it is a little different flying a helicopter over water than it is land.

Now, I am a helicopter pilot, and when I am hovering that helicopter, I do not care what is under me, as long as the rascal stays up. [Laughter.]

That is all we want to teach them.

So these are just a few of the things. I have not been appointed chairman of the Armed Services Committee yet. Maybe I never will. At the rate we are going, there is some doubt.

But I want to make it perfectly clear to my brethren in this body that I am not opposed to military cuts, but I want some help and I want some sensible suggestions. Here are three areas where the Senator from Arizona is going to start to work.

Again, I thank my friend from Wyoming and I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, indeed, during the coming debate in the months ahead and weeks ahead, we will be listening to this man, Senator GOLDWATER, as he shares with us these comments of his on the tough decisions we must make. He will be an integral part of that and a critical part of it, and I am certainly ready to listen to him. I have the greatest and deepest respect for him. He is one of the reasons I got into this political game back in the 1960's. I thank him.

I do not believe any other Members on this side of the aisle require any of the leadership time. Therefore, I yield back the remaining leadership time on this side.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The acting Democratic leader is recognized.

THE DEFENSE BUDGET

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, first I want to congratulate my good friend from Arizona for his statement. I am delighted that he is going to be the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. I am sure he will do a great job.

All of us in this body without exception say we need a strong military force. I do not know anybody—anybody on the Democratic side or Republican side—that does not agree that we do not live in a Sunday school world. We have to have a nuclear force and a conventional force that can command respect.

We do disagree, however, on what we should cut. I think that the incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee has put his finger on a couple of very, very good areas.

I am particularly happy to welcome his request to us that we suggest to him what can be reduced because I have several ideas in mind, including some military activity in my own State of Wisconsin.

ANTISATELLITE AGREEMENT ESSENTIAL TO ALL OTHER ARMS CONTROL

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on November 6, the New York Times reported that a study commissioned by the Reagan administration flatly contradicts the administration's frequently expressed conviction that a treaty with the Soviet Union to limit antisatellite weapons would not serve American interests. In the New York Times article, reporter Wayne Biddle wrote that last spring the Reagan administration told the Congress:

> No arrangements or agreements beyond those already governing military activities in outer space have been found to date that are judged to be in the overall interests of the United States and its allies.

Well, Mr. President, it now appears the administration was handed a study last summer that the administration itself commissioned that spelled out exactly why an arms control agreement to limit research, production, and deployment of antisatellite weapons would indeed serve our interests. The study commissioned by the Reagan administration was completed last July. It was not released until election day, November 6, 1984, so it would not become a "political football" before the election. How do you like that one? That study concluded:

> Arms control for antisatellite weapons can support United States security interests.

Why did the study reach this conclusion? Here is what it said:

> It would be more difficult to roll back ASAT capabilities a decade hence when they may pose highly problematical threats to American use of space, than it would be at the current time. Arms control agreements historically have been less difficult to apply as preventive than as remedial measures.

Members of the Congress should keep in mind another conclusion of this report as we consider authorization and appropriation measures to advance the antimissile or "Star Wars" program. The study contended that:

> If the 1972 treaty that restricts anti-missile systems was terminated, anti-satellite agreements would be meaningless because the associated technologies are closely related.

What does this mean? Does it mean that if the Congress funds antimissile research as the President has recommended this would constitute a violation of the ABM treaty and put the treaty in jeopardy? Gerard Smith who negotiated the treaty for the Nixon administration argues that this is exactly what this Star Wars research does.

The study does not come down for arms control as the one and only answer to nuclear war. It says:

> It must be emphasized that arms control measures are not panaceas and are no substitute for programs to enhance satellite survivability and to monitor Soviet activities with respect to space.

But the report does say arms control "would afford better protection of U.S. satellites" than such programs "enacted in the context of an unconstrained weapons competition."

If this report means anything, it means that the administration should promptly agree to negotiations with the Soviet Union on limiting antisatellite weapons. Would the Russians come to the bargaining table on this? No question about it. This is one of the four subjects Soviet leader Chernenko specified as a basis for United States-Soviet arms control negotiations.

The study was commissioned by the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. It was made by a researcher at Harvard University's School of Government, William J. Durch, a research fellow.

Apparently the Harvard study did not consider the arms control implications of Soviet-United States competition aside from the previously mentioned conclusion that arms control would contain antisatellite competition. The big reason why it is essential that both powers move to stop an antisatellite arms race is because satellite monitoring constitutes the quintessential basis for arms control verification. Without satellites, we can forget arms control. William Colby, the former head of the CIA, told a defense appropriations subcommittee last year that satellite verification of arms control agreements constitutes a reliable basis for verifying even the most comprehensive of arms control agreements: An across-the-board freeze on all nuclear weapons. Colby contended that satellite monitoring provided far more reliable, more accurate and more detailed intelligence on Soviet Union nuclear weapons activities than any other available means including on-the-spot inspection. Does William Colby speak with authority? Absolutely. How could we find a better qualified expert than a man who has served for years as the Director of this country's Central Intelligence Agency? The overwhelming majority of Americans favor verifiable arms control agreements to end the nuclear arms race. But the majority quickly evaporates if Americans are asked if they favor arms control agreements that cannot be verified. The administration has repeatedly opposed negotiating arms control agreements with the Soviet Union on the grounds that we cannot verify them. If the Congress funds the antisatellite program called for by the administration, the administration and most Americans, including this Senator, will be driven to oppose virtually all arms control agreements. Obviously if the United States and the Soviet Union proceed in this antisatellite arms race, both will eventually succeed. When they do, no satellite system of monitoring arms control agreements will be safe. The die will be cast. We will have to place our full reliance on winning an across-the-board nuclear arms race with the Soviet Union. If that happens, here is one Senator who would not expect his grandchildren to live out their lives.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred by Wayne Biddle in the November 6, 1984, New York Times be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARMS CURB STUDY HELD UP TILL VOTE

(By Wayne Biddle)

WASHINGTON, November 5.—The Arms Control and Disarmament Agency has withheld making public a study of antisatellite arms control issues pending the election.

The study, written on contract for the agency by a Harvard University researcher, is not classified, and it departs from Reagan Administration policy in concluding that agreements with the Soviet Union to limit antisatellite weapons could benefit American interests.

Joseph Lehman, director of public affairs for the agency, an independent body that advises the President and the Secretary of State, said today that he did not want the study to become a "political football" before the election.

He said he was using his "own discretion" in refusing reporters' requests for the paper, but he offered to make a copy available Tuesday.

UNAWARE, RESEARCHER SAYS

The study, dated July 1984, was written by William J. Durch, a research fellow at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government. Reached by telephone today at his home in Massachusetts, Mr. Durch said he was unaware that the agency was withholding the report from the public.

He said his contract merely required that he give the agency 60 days' notice before publishing it himself. This notice was given in mid-September, he said.

Last spring the Reagan Administration told Congress, "No arrangements or agreements beyond those already governing military activities in outer space have been found to date that are judged to be in the overall interest of the United States and its allies."

But the study for the arms control agency, a copy of which was obtained today from sources outside the Government, concluded, "Arms control for antisatellite weapons can support United States security interests."

"It would be more difficult to roll back ASAT capabilities a decade hence," the study said, using an acronym for antisatellite, "when they may pose highly problematic threats to American use of space, than it would be at the current time. Arms control agreements, historically, have been less difficult to apply as preventive than as remedial measures."

LIMITATIONS ARE NOTED

The study said that antisatellite arms control "is necessarily limited in its scope," listing these areas of potential difficulty:

Treaties could not eliminate all "nondestructive" means of tampering with satellites, such as electronic jamming.

No agreement could remove the threat to satellites posed by strategic ballistic missiles, whose nuclear warheads can be programmed to explode in space.

If the 1972 treaty that restricts antimissile systems was terminated, antisatellite agreements would be meaningless because the associated technologies are closely related.

NOT PANACEAS, STUDY SAYS

"It must be emphasized that arms control measures are not panaceas and are no substitute for programs to enhance satellite survivability and to monitor Soviet activities with respect to space," the report said. Yet arms control, it went on, would "afford better protection to U.S. satellites" than such programs "enacted in the context of an unconstrained weapons competition."

In April, Richard N. Perle, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Policy, told Congress that a "small covert supply" of Soviet antisatellite weapons "would be enough to do a disproportionate amount of damage to our space assets."

He said there were many ways to develop antisatellite systems "in the guise of something else" and that "an unverifiable treaty is far worse than no treaty at all."

THREAT TO CONFIDENCE SEEN

While acknowledging the technical problems in verifying an antisatellite treaty, the Durch study maintained that "excessively high standards" of verification can "undermine policymakers' confidence in the means of monitoring, or their confidence in other parties' compliance, when such erosion is unwarranted."

The Pentagon programs bill for the fiscal year 1985 stipulates that the Air Force may not test its current antisatellite weapon against an object in space unless the President certifies that he is seeking to negotiate a limitation on such weapons with the Russians.

The measure also requires such tests to be "fully consistent" with the 1972 antimissile treaty. Furthermore, no more than two successful tests may be held in the fiscal year 1985, which began Oct. 1.

The Pentagon has estimated the cost of acquiring the Air Force weapon, a missile fired directly at enemy satellites in low orbits from an F-15 jet fighter, at $4 billion.

TORTURE IN CHILE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today I wish to speak out against human rights violations in Chile. A recent Amnesty International bulletin discusses the appalling frequency in which torture occurs there and elsewhere in the world. Though torture is universally condemned, scores of nations permit or condone this barbaric act.

Widespread and systematic torture has been reported from Chile for years. Hundreds of citizens have filed complaints with numerous national and international organizations, accusing the Chilean secret police of various atrocities. Methods of torture include the beating and burning of victims as well as the use of electrical shocks.

Many find it hard to believe that these acts occur in present day society. Ruthless torture and murder are associated with the past. They are viewed as horrors of another era.

Unfortunately Mr. President this view is naive. This era is plagued with its own horrors much like the worst of our past. According to Amnesty's report, a third of the world's governments permit or condone institutionalized torture. Is this the behavior of a supposedly mature, civilized world? Is this type of behavior an improvement over the past? The horrors of the Holocaust, Cambodia, Uganda, and Chile all blend into a similar scenario, one that is as possible now as it was 40 years ago. After World War II a cry of "never again" arose as the world condemned the barbaric events of the Holocaust. So far it has been wishful thinking.

Mr. President, this body has an opportunity to take a small but important step toward a more humane world. By ratifying the Genocide Treaty we will outlaw the most deplorable crime known to man. We will move forward in our quest to preserve human rights, and we will demonstrate to the world our concern for the sanctity of human life. Let us move forward and ratify the Genocide Treaty.

THE NATIONAL TAXPAYERS' UNION DESERVES THE NATION'S THANKS

Mr. PROXMIRE. God bless the National Taxpayers' Union. Here is a lobbying organization that is a true David fighting against lobbying Goliaths on behalf of the American taxpayer. For 15 years it has fought on gallantly against overwhelming odds—usually as our colossal national debt and mammoth deficits so painfully show in a losing cause. But not always. Thanks in no small part to the National Taxpayers' Union, the taxpayer has not lost every battle. The NTU has helped cut down the multibillion dollar synthetic fuel give away. It played a central role in sharply reducing the cost of the Garrison Diversion project. The NTU played the major lobbying part in stopping the Clinch River breeder reactor, in killing an effort to require the Federal Reserve Board to pay interest on required reserves, and in stopping funding for the National Endowment for Democracy and a big timber bailout. It has helped save the taxpayer billions.

Many Members of the Congress resent the annual NTU rollcall that assesses a Member's record on spending issues. But of all the congressional rollcalls published by outside interests, the NTU is the most comprehensive and the most objective. Most organizations grade the record of Members of Congress on the basis of 10 or 20 votes out of the hundreds cast. Not the NTU. The NTU includes far more rollcalls than any other group. In fact, it covers virtually every rollcall involving the spending of Federal money, whether it is for a water project, farm price supports, education, childhood nutrition, small business, big business, a jobs program vigorously supported by organized labor, legal services, a military procurement program, foreign aid and all the others.

The strength of this annual NTU rollcall is that it makes no effort to provide a self-serving moral assessment. Whether the expenditure serves the interest of organized labor or big business, the wealthy or the poor, NTU recognizes it as an expenditure of taxpayers' money. At a time when the No. 1 problem facing this country is the most immense deficit in our history, this single minded attention to votes on Federal spending—all significant Federal spending—provides the kind of discipline the Congress urgently needs. Members of the Congress may deny it. But they do pay attention to that NTU rollcall. I have campaigned all over the country for congressional candidates and I find that the NTU rollcall is far and away the most frequently quoted rollcall. In fact, it is the only rollcall that competing congressional candidates will cite in debates or meetings before the general public and in their television and radio commercials. Obviously, an AFL-CIO rollcall is cited before a union crowd, a chamber of commerce rollcall before a business group or a National Security Association rollcall before a military or veterans organization. And for the teachers, candidates will trot out a National Education Association rollcall. Before farmers, it is a Farm Bureau or a Farmers Union rollcall. In all of these other rollcalls the consistent common denominator is support of Federal policies that help the particular group conducting the poll. In most cases that means expending the taxpayers' money.

The NTU has won powerful enemies by confronting virtually all of them. NTU has little money, a relatively small membership. But they have the biggest and best issue in American politics today—Federal spending. With Federal spending now absorbing a massive 24 percent of the entire gross national product, with a Federal deficit that forces the Federal Government to borrow two-thirds of all the new savings of the American people, with a national debt rushing on toward $2 trillion dollars, this country has no more critical priority than bringing its spending under control. For 15 years the National Taxpayers Union has been preaching this doctrine. They foresaw the dangerous, irresponsible direction the Federal spending machine was pushing this country's economy long before other organizations. They have pursued their opposition to this spending with a rare and single minded ferocity.

In doing so, of course, they have attracted strong conservatives. But the NTU has gone out of its way to avoid being sidetracked by any ideology, except the simple and single ideology of thrift. They fought hard against the B-1 bomber in an effort that must have cooled the ardor of typical conservative ideologues. And, in December at the NTU award reception, the NTU deliberately singled out many downright, all-out liberal Members for their fight to cut Federal spending. Congressman SILVIO CONTE, for example, is recognized as one of the most liberal Members of the House. But he also lead a successful fight against the Garrison Diversion project. So he was specially cited and honored by the NTU. HOWARD WOLPE, a hard charging, civil rights liberal was also singled out for his battle against wasteful water projects by NTU. I have served with both CONTE and WOLPE on conference committees. You will not find more compassionate and concerned liberals anywhere in the Congress. Throughout this year, the NTU will be front and center in the battle to hold down Federal spending, just as it has been for the past 15 years.

Ah, but this year there will be a difference. In 1985 the NTU will again be taking on virtually all the outside lobbying groups when it takes its position strictly on the taxpayer's side. If somehow the taxpayer wins this deficit fight and Congress holds down Federal spending, this little organization with its persistent and single objective will deserve a very big share of the credit.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time, if there is any time remaining for the leader, and yield the floor.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I thank the acting minority leader.

SENATOR PAUL SIMON

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I note the presence in the Chamber of the new distinguished Senator from Illinois whom I came to know many years ago when we worked together in State legislative activities. He is displaying the same attentiveness to these proceedings as he did when he served in the Illinois Legislature, when I first met him. It is pleasant to welcome him.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, if the acting majority leader will yield, I want to welcome PAUL SIMON, too. PAUL SIMON is a man who has a really marvelous record. I cannot think of anybody who can serve better in this body. He was picked as the outstanding legislator in the Illinois Legislature year after year, more than anyone.

PAUL SIMON came to the House and served with great distinction in the House, as all of us who worked with him and observed him on conference committees know.

I am sure he is going to bring to this body wisdom and compassion. He has a great understanding and concern for educational issues and many others. I am just delighted that PAUL SIMON is going to serve in this body. He is going to definitely raise the level of confidence, intelligence, and concern. I just cannot wait to work with him on a number of issues that I know we will have before us.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I am glad to mention, too, that it gives me renewed spirit, vigor, and hope as I will now drag out my entire collection of old bow ties and will begin to sport them, as I used to in days of yore.

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY—TREATY DOCUMENT NO. 99-1

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the 1983 Partial Revision of the Radio Regulations and a Final Protocol (Treaty Doc. No. 99-1), transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States on January 4, 1985.

I also ask that the treaty be considered as having been read the first time; that it be referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed; and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The message of the President is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the 1983 Partial Revision of the Radio Regulations (Geneva, 1979) and a Final Protocol, signed on behalf of the United States at Geneva on March 18, 1983.

I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Department of State with respect to the 1983 Partial Revision.

The 1983 Revision constitutes a partial revision of the Radio Regulations (Geneva, 1979) to which the United States is a party. The primary purpose of the present revision is to update the existing Regulations to take into account introduction of advanced techniques for maritime mobile, distress and safety communications. The Revision is consistent with the proposals of and positions taken by the United States at the 1983 World Administrative Radio Conference for the Mobile Services of the International Telecommunication Union.

At the time of signature, the United States Delegation submitted a statement countering an unfounded political allegation of Cuba. The specific statement, with reason, is given in the report of the Department of State.

The 1983 Partial Revision of the Radio Regulations will enter into force on January 15, 1985 for Governments that, by that date, have notified the Secretary General of the International Telecommunication Union of their approval thereof. I believe that the United States should become a party to the 1983 Partial Revision as soon as possible, and it is my hope that the Senate will take early action on this matter and give its advice and consent to ratification.

LEGISLATION TO CREATE COMMISSION TO REVIEW THE ROLE OF THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, the American ship of state has again safely sailed through the electoral process culminating in what we are about to observe here: The reelection of the President and Vice President of the United States of America. Yet the very process still raises some questions among the American public and among the observers of the American political scene as to the efficacy of the electoral college.

Can it work in the future; can it continue to work as smoothly as it has up to this point in American history? I intend to continue to raise the question about the electoral college by introducing legislation that would create a commission to review the propriety and the role of the electoral college. We must prevent, in the future, an electoral power failure which can occur under the present system.

Mr. Speaker, I ask each Member, and I ask the entire House to look approvingly upon a process by which we can raise these questions and come to some solution before the next Presidential election.

RESOLUTION DESIGNATING MEMBERSHIP ON CERTAIN STANDING COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Democratic caucus, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 27) designating membership on certain standing committees of the House, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 27

Resolved, That the following named Members be, and they are hereby, elected to the following standing committees of the House of Representatives:

Committee on Agriculture: E de la Garza, Texas (chairman);

Committee on Appropriations: Jamie L. Whitten, Mississippi (chairman);

Committee on Armed Services: Les Aspin, Wisconsin (chairman);

RECESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of Thursday, January 3, 1985, the Chair declares the House in recess until approximately 12:55 p.m.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p.m.), the House stood in recess until 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p.m.

□ 1250

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore at 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p.m.

COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES—JOINT SESSION OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE HELD PURSUANT TO THE PROVISIONS OF SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 1

At 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p.m., the Doorkeeper, the Honorable James T. Molloy, announced the Vice President and the Senate of the United States.

The Senate entered the Hall of the House of Representatives, headed by the Vice President and the Secretary of the Senate, the Members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The Vice President took his seat as the Presiding Officer of the joint convention of the two Houses, the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WRIGHT] of the House occupying the chair on his left.

The joint session was called to order by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Speaker, Members of the Congress, the Senate and the House of Representatives, pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution and the laws of the United States, have met in joint session for the purpose of opening the certificates and ascertaining and counting the votes of the electors of the several States for President and Vice President.

Under the precedents, unless a motion shall be made in any case, the reading of the formal portions of the certificates will be dispensed with after ascertainment has been made that the certificates are authentic and correct in form, the tellers will count and make a list of the votes cast by the electors of the several States.

The tellers on the part of the two Houses will take their respective places at the Clerk's desk.

The tellers, Mr. MATHIAS and Mr. FORD on the part of the Senate, and Mr. ANNUNZIO and Mr. ROBERTS on the part of the House, took their places at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will now hand to the tellers the certificates of the electors for President and Vice President of the State of Alabama, and they will count and make a list of the votes cast by that State.

Mr. ANNUNZIO (one of the tellers). Mr. President, the certificate of the electoral vote of the State of Alabama seems to be regular in form and authentic, and it appears therefrom that Ronald Reagan of the State of California received nine votes for President, and GEORGE BUSH of the State of Texas received nine votes for Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the Chair will omit in further procedure the formal statement just made for the State of Alabama, and we will open the certificates in alphabetical order and pass to the tellers the vote of the electors in each State; and the tellers will then read, count, and announce the result in each State as was done in the case of the State of Alabama.

Is there objection?

The Chair hears no objection.

There was no objection.

The tellers then proceeded to read, count, and announce, as was done in the case of the State of Alabama, the electoral votes of the several States in alphabetical order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Gentlemen and gentlewomen of the Congress, the certificates of all of the States have now been opened and read and the tellers will make the final ascertainment of the results and deliver the same to the President of the Senate.

The tellers delivered to the President of the Senate the following statement of the results:

The undersigned, CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, JR. and WENDELL H. FORD tellers on the part of the Senate, FRANK ANNUNZIO and PAT ROBERTS tellers on the part of the House of Representatives, report the following as the result of the ascertainment and counting of the electoral vote for President and Vice President of the United States for the term beginning on the twentieth day of January, nineteen hundred and eighty-five.

NATURAL GAS REFORM ACT OF 1985

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today the Natural Gas Reform Act of 1985. The purpose of the bill is to increase competition in the natural gas field, particularly with respect to the transport of natural gas, and thereby hopefully bring about a reduction in consumer prices.

The need for action in this regard has been apparent for the last 2 years, during which time we have seen the incongruity of increased supplies of natural gas resulting in not lower, but higher prices to the consumer. In many areas, those price increases have been unconscionable. In central Illinois, for instance, prices have nearly doubled during that period of time.

If the free enterprise system were working properly, increased supplies should lead to a lowering of prices. Unfortunately, free enterprise principles do not fully operate in the natural gas field today, particularly in the purchasing and transportation of natural gas.

Natural gas pipeline companies are in a virtual monopoly position. Most transportation companies are simply in the business of transporting a product. In this case, however, the pipelines not only transport, but buy and sell the product as well. By doing so, they have both the producer and local utility over a barrel, because both in essence have to take what the pipeline gives them.

Current Federal law enhances this monopoly position by allowing pipeline companies to automatically pass on price increases with very little restriction, and to write contracts preventing local utilities from buying gas from competing pipelines or directly from producers.

The result is that pipelines have had very little incentive to purchase the cheapest gas possible. Eastern Panhandle, for instance, had been sending high priced Canadian and Algerian gas to central Illinois at a time when much cheaper gas was available domestically. It could get away with doing this because it was able to automatically pass on the higher cost to the local utility, because the local utility was prevented by restrictive contract with Panhandle from buying gas from another pipeline, and because Panhandle would refuse to ship in gas that the local utility might buy directly from a producer.

It is time that these anticompetitive practices come to a halt, and that is what the bill I am introducing seeks to do.

The bill mandates a system of contract carriage, whereby the pipeline must agree to transport gas, if it has the capacity, which a utility may purchase directly from a producer. This provision will enable a utility to go out into the market and purchase the lowest priced gas available, and not be limited to whatever the pipeline offers. The Illinois Commerce Commission indicates that such increased flexibility will result in significant savings to the consumer.

Other provisions in the bill will enable utilities to get out from under contracts with pipelines which require utilities to take a certain amount of gas and pay for it even if it isn't taken, and pipelines to get out from under similar contracts with producers.

Another provision will prohibit restrictive contracts between pipelines and utilities that have the effect of preventing pipelines from purchasing gas from another pipeline. This provision will enable the Central Illinois Light & Power Co. [Cilco] in particular, to purchase lower priced gas from a competing pipeline.

The bill will end the current Federal Energy Regulatory Commission practice of automatically passing through an entire pipeline rate increase prior to determining whether it is justified. The bill will limit any automatic passthrough to the rate of inflation during the preceding rate period, and require the Commission to decide the rate case within 6 months from the date it is filed. At present, rate cases are allowed to drag on ad infinitum, all the while the consumer pays the higher price. This streamlining of procedures will put an end to this abuse of the process.

FERC is also given authority under the bill to consider whether a pipeline made the best deal possible in determining whether a rate increase is justified.

Finally, the bill includes a provision that prevents a resumption of shipments of Algerian gas unless it is competitive with market prices, and prevents the consumer from being saddled with any costs Panhandle may incur for not having continued the purchase of Algerian gas under a previous contract.

These various provisions of the Natural Gas Reform Act will eliminate current distortions in the purchase and transportation of natural gas. They will enhance competition and increase incentives for the purchase and shipment of lower priced gas. The result will almost certainly be lower prices to consumers, particularly in those regions where monopolyism has been most evident.

I regret that Congress did not act on natural gas legislation along this line last year, but this is a new year and I hope we can expedite action.

Mr. Speaker, I include in my remarks a section-by-section analysis of the bill.

EXPLANATION OF NATURAL GAS REFORM ACT OF 1985

TITLE I—NONDISCRIMINATORY TRANSPORTATION OF NATURAL GAS

This title would promote competition in the natural gas market by requiring pipelines to transport natural gas for anyone, on a nondiscriminatory basis, to the extent of the pipelines' excess capacity. Pipelines are presumed to have available capacity to transport natural gas on a firm or an interruptible basis. A pipeline that does not want to transport natural gas after receiving a reasonable written request to do so must obtain a FERC determination that capacity is not available. Thus, the burden of proving capacity is placed on the entity with the knowledge of capacity, the pipeline, not the would-be shipper.

No transportation obligation would apply to local distribution companies. Special rules are provided for cases in which a customer of a local distribution company seeks to interconnect with an interstate pipeline. In reviewing such requests, the FERC must take into account the impact that the approval of such a request would have on the existing customers of the local distribution company involved.

TITLE II—CONTRACT AND TARIFF PRACTICES

Section 201 provides take-or-pay relief for purchasers of natural gas. During the two-year period beginning on the date of enactment of this law, purchasers may reduce takes to 60 percent of the contracted volume. If the volumes taken under all contracts have been reduced to 60 percent, purchasers may also reduce takes by such additional amounts, determined by FERC rule or order, as are necessary to offset reduced demand resulting from increased contract carriage volumes. This take-or-pay relief does not apply to contracts which have been renegotiated to exclude the application of this section after the date of enactment or in cases where natural gas production may be jeopardized as specified in subsection e.

The seller of gas not taken by reason of this section may terminate its contract with the purchaser with respect to such amounts. The purchaser shall transport such "released" volumes to a new buyer under the contract carriage provisions set forth in Title I.

Section 202 gives the purchaser which has received take-or-pay relief under this section a 30-day period in which to purchase released gas before it can be sold to a new buyer.

Section 203 eliminates minimum commodity bill requirements (provisions in contracts between pipelines and their customers similar to take-or-pay requirements between producers and pipelines) and restrictive pipeline tariffs. A local distribution company would not have to pay the pipeline for natural gas the company did not purchase. In addition, a distribution company may not be locked into a single pipeline supplier by a tariff which makes buying natural gas from other suppliers economically impossible.

TITLE III—PIPELINE ACCOUNTABILITY AND RATE PROCEDURES

Section 301 prohibits FERC from automatically allowing pipelines to pass through to consumers increases in purchased gas costs in excess of inflation. Any such increase would have to be justified and found to be reasonable by the Commission before it could be implemented.

Section 302 requires that all pipeline rate cases be decided by FERC within six months from the time they are filed. This would reduce the current practice whereby consumers are charged higher rates pending the outcome of cases which drag on for years. At the end of that time, a refund may be ordered but it seldom compensates consumers for the excessive costs they have borne while the case was pending. Legal gamesmanship and, consequently, consumer costs would also be reduced.

Section 303 amends section 601(c) of the Natural Gas Policy Act by defining the term "similar grounds," a basis for denial of recovery of interstate pipelines' gas purchase costs, to include "imprudence," including a pipeline's failure to seek the least expensive gas available. The Commission, however, may not use this authority to declare that natural gas purchase prices above a certain level are presumed imprudent or that those below a certain level are presumed prudent. Such declarations would amount to the establishment of well-head price controls by the Commission.

TITLE IV—CERTAIN IMPORTED NATURAL GAS

This title prohibits the importation of liquefied natural gas (LNG) through certain facilities unless the Secretary of Energy has found that the price of gas is reasonable and that the contract is responsive to changing market conditions.

With respect to LNG which has been authorized to be imported into the U.S. through facilities at Lake Charles, Louisiana, (the port of entry for the Algerian LNG purchased by Panhandle) but which has not been imported because of a service interruption, the Commission may not allow consumers to be charged for any payment the importer may be obligated to make for the gas involved or for the transportation of such gas.

DOUBLE WAGE SCALE IN POSTAL SERVICE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CARNEY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, ours is a compassionate Nation, our Government is a compassionate government, and our governmental agencies should reflect that compassion in their dealings with our citizens. So, when an agency like the U.S. Postal Service doublecrosses its new employees, it is time for this Congress and the American people to sit up and take notice.

This Congress realized the potential problems associated with a double wage scale within the Postal Service. However, as a cost-containment measure contained within the recent binding arbitration decision affecting the Postal Service and its two largest unions, this double scale was an acceptable method of curtailing postal expenses, provided it was applied in a fair and straightforward way. Unfortunately, the Postal Service saw fit to apply this provision retroactively to new employees. Individuals who were hired and told to report to work well prior to the January 18 cut-off date were subsequently told not to report to work until after that date and were advised that they could expect to receive substantively lower salaries than they had previously been promised. I am told that large numbers of individuals across the country are being affected by this blatant doublecross.

I was appalled to learn from one of my own constituents just what a severe impact this type of action can have.

My constituent, a disabled veteran, left a well-paid position to serve the public through the U.S. Postal Service. He was told on December 1 of last year that his employment was to begin on January 5 with an annual salary of $20,458. He was officially hired on December 20 and filled out final paperwork, stating his wages, and was given orders to report for regular duty on January 9. Then, on December 28, my constituent was advised that new employees hired with his starting date were being frozen until January 19, and that those persons hired on this later date would probably be hired at a lesser wage. On December 29, he was given the specifics of the wage decrease for his grade, although he was again told they weren't sure how this would affect him. As a result of this, my constituent stands to lose over $5,600 a year in salary. And his former employer has filled his old position. Is this how a compassionate country treats those who attempt to serve in public service positions?

I learned only this past Friday, in response to my personal inquiries to Postal Service officials, that, although great numbers of persons are being affected by this back-handed approach to postal hiring and numerous complaints have been lodged against the Postal Service, including many from Members of this body, no action is currently being considered to rescind this arbitrary and unfair treatment of this agency's workers.

Congress should demand that the Postmaster General honor any verbal contracts made with new postal employees. We all seek savings in Government; however, this approach is dead wrong. It is not the business of this Government, of this country to wreck careers and disrupt homes by this kind of doublecross. I call on my colleagues to join me in this condemnation of the Postal Service's action and to work with me to being about a reversal of this unconscionable decision.●

STATUTORY HISTORY OF THE U.S. CAPITOL POLICE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, the Congressional Research Service, directed by our esteemed former colleague, the Honorable Gilbert Gude, has delivered to my office, as chairman of the Committee on House Administration, a 300-page report titled "The Statutory History of the United States Capitol Police." This report was accompanied by five binders containing copies of those "Statutes at Large" which pertain to the U.S. Capitol Police, from the 1st Congress through the 98th Congress. The statutes were taken from the original laws from 1789 through 1984.

I extend my congratulation to the Chief of the CRS Government Division, Frederick R. Pauls, and the author of the report, Judy Carlile (Shepherd), for the comprehensive detail and thoroughness of this written history which took serveral years to research and compile. I requested it while serving as chairman of your Subcommittee on Personnel and Police during the 96th Congress. It presents the statutes as they were enacted, as they remain on the books, and as they were repealed or modified.

To my knowledge this is the first report of its kind, and will be of inestimable value to present and future Members of Congress who may be considering further legislation with relation to the Capitol Police.●

THE EMPLOYEE RETIREMENT INCOME SECURITY ACT OF 1974

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a bill to amend the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 [ERISA]. This legislation is identical to that which I proposed in the last Congress.

As it stands now, ERISA's protections are incomplete; the law explicitly protects worker pension plans from the ravages of corporate mergers, but does not cover any of the numerous other, nonpension, worker programs—life insurance, accidental death, and dismemberment insurance, and disability retirement income plans, and so forth—that millions of the Nation's workers have earned and rely on presently, any of these many nonpension programs can be wiped out through the course of a corporate merger. Often such programs are as important, if not more important, to the economic security and well-being of retirees as their basic pension plans which ERISA protects. This bill will extend ERISA's merger protection provisions to all employee benefit plans, pension or otherwise.

Hearings were held during the last Congress on this remedial legislation before the Labor-Management Subcommittee of the Education and Labor Committee. It is my hope, therefore, that this bill may be expeditiously considered by the House.●

SCHOOL DISTRICT CONSOLIDATIONS AMENDMENTS OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, recently a Federal district judge ordered the consolidation of historically independent school districts in my home county. He did this supposedly to eliminate segregation, but all three districts had been operating under court-approved desegregation plans for over 15 years, all 3 of which involved large-scale cross-town busing. It was done even though 70 percent of both the black and the white parents in each district are opposed to consolidation. It was done even though all three districts admittedly have excellent educational programs. It was done even though it was shown that consolidation would have no educational benefit and would actually cause harm. It was done even though numerous experts testified there were several less drastic remedies available that would correct any problems.

This is wrong. This Nation is unique in its provision for local control of its schools. Other nations have Federal control of education, but the people of the United States have always believed that parents, not the courts, should decide how their children should be taught.

The right to an integrated education available to all citizens is fundamental and I support it totally, but this does not justify the dissolution of independent school districts unless every other means of ensuring this fundamental right has been tried and shown to fail.

Federal judges are now making law. The Federal courts have usurped their authority by overstepping the powers granted to them by Congress. Article III section I of the Constitution clearly gives Congress the right to define the areas that Federal district courts may review. It also gives Congress the power to set guidelines for these courts in those matters it allows the courts to review.

My bill addresses one of the areas in which the courts have overstepped their authority and offers a viable solution to this problem without violating our constitutional rights to a fair Federal judicial system. I urge your support for this bill. The people deserve the least possible court interference in their lives and this bill is a rational step in that direction without deserting our constitutional guarantee of equal opportunity for all citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I include the text of my bill for the information of my colleagues:

H.R. —

A bill to provide that district courts of the United States may not order the consolidation of school districts as a remedy in certain school desegregation cases unless no other relief is available to remedy the unlawful segregation of students, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "School District Consolidations Amendments of 1985".

IN MEMORY OF DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RODINO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the upcoming birthday of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., who would have been 56 years old on January 15. Although another year must pass before official recognition of the Martin Luther King national holiday, it is fitting that his birthday this year serve as a day to reflect upon and reaffirm the great principles of freedom, equality and civil rights that he so nobly espoused.

A nation will prosper only as long as it generates dreams and ideals for all of its people. It takes a man of conscience and conviction to conceive of and live for those dreams. Martin Luther King, Jr., was, indeed, such a man.

His was a dream of social, political and economic justice for all. He dedicated his life to securing a society that will judge its citizens not by the color of their skin, but by the quality of their character and the contents of their mind. To Dr. King, no obstacle was too great to strive for the brotherhood of man.

The civil rights laws guaranteeing equal opportunity and equal rights would be legacy enough for most great men. But not for Dr. King. For his is also a legacy of hope and promise that bigotry will be erased, justice will be served, and human rights will be respected in this country and throughout the world.

In 1975, I told the Southern Christian Leadership Conference:

They shot down the man—and they snuffed out his life—but they could not shoot down his dream. For his dream was stronger than life and more powerful than death. And the dream lives on.

Yes, the dream for which Dr. King gave his life lives on. But the promised land of freedom and equality that he saw while standing at the mountaintop is still, for too many Americans, a dream deferred. Though we have moved closer to the ideal of Dr. King's, the journey is far from complete.

On Dr. King's birthday, our Nation will remember his achievements, mourn his potential, and pay tribute to his ideals. As we renew our commitment to reaching "the sunlit path of racial justice," let us dedicate ourselves to honoring him in the single most meaningful way we can—let us work, as a nation, toward the fulfillment of his dream.●

PRESIDENTIAL COMMISSION TO REVIEW PROCESS OF ELECTORAL COLLEGE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would create a Presidential commission made up of five individuals to review the process of the electoral college and to report back within 2 years as to recommendations on the electoral college.

Although today we have seen a process which has successfully reflected the will of the American people, there are still a number of questions about the electoral college which must be addressed.

It is possible under the present system that someday in the future we will not be as lucky as we were today, and that we could encounter an electoral power failure because of those particular flaws. The Commission will be mandated to review all these processes and to see what, among the various recommendations that have come up over the years, might be useful to replace or to modify and retain the present electoral college system.

The only serious flaw that I see at the moment in the electoral college, addressing an amendment to which I would like to subscribe, is the fact that after each State convenes its electoral college, and presumably those electors in that individual State will be voting for the candidate who won the majority of votes in his particular State, an elector still does not have to vote for that candidate. It is possible then in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania where I come from, where Ronald Reagan won an overwhelming victory, that the electors who convened in his name in late December to cast ballots in the electoral college could have, for some unforeseen or some unreasoning reason, cast their votes for Walter Mondale or for any other individual that they desired. This is a flaw in the present system that could wreak havoc in Presidential elections of the future.

In recent Gallup polls and Harris polls dating back to 1980 and 1981, it has been announced to the world that the American public would rather have direct elections of the President where the popular vote would count automatically, rather than to go through the process of the electoral college which can really, under the present system, thwart the will of the American people. So although I do not favor abolition of the electoral college in the present circumstances, I do feel that we ought to raise the questions that are raised normally by its very existence and have a Presidential commission examine all the alternatives and come back with solid recommendations.

What can they recommend? They could recommend a proportional allocation of electoral votes so that in Pennsylvania, if 60 percent of the vote went to Ronald Reagan, then 60 percent of the electors should be mandated to vote for Ronald Reagan at their later formal election in the electoral college.

There could be a direct election by the people where there would be no electoral college at all and simple mathematics would prevail so that the individual who received the greatest number of votes nationwide would be elected President of the United States. That has its flaws, and that has certain criticisms which must be examined, and I am not personally prepared to go headlong into direct elections without taking into consideration the two-party system that we have and some other sanctified procedures that we have in the electoral process.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEKAS. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman for his interest in this subject and indicate that I, too, share that view and believe that it would be well worth it to look into the process.

But I want to add for the record at this early point, in what should be a great and historical debate, that I commend the gentleman and the other gentleman who has come into the well on this same idea for their leadership.

I would point out, for example, the situation in the Midwest. In a State like mine, Nebraska, we are a small State; we have three Members of the House and two in the other body, which gives us a total of five, and if you take a look at the demographics of registered voters in this country, over half the registered voters in this country reside in 11 States. So it is possible, if we went to a one-person, one-vote rule, that you would never see a candidate for President of either party because they would campaign carefully in 11 States, and for all practical purposes, except for Texas and California, they would not even have to worry about the rest of the States west of the Mississippi.

So there is some value in looking at the idea of preserving the electoral college, at least to the extent that a small State can make a difference in that process. It is from that point of view that I, as one Member from a small State, commend the gentleman for his interest and hope that it is a study and that we are not so convinced, in conjunction with the gentleman's last remark, that one-person, one-vote is the way we ought to go.

Mr. GEKAS. That is exactly correct.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I appreciate the gentleman's remarks.

I would point out that if I were on that commission, I would be predisposed to opposing elimination of the electoral college. My chief concern is the fact that the electors themselves are not bound, by the time they reach the electoral college proceedings, to reflect that their own State determined during a general election. That is my chief worry, that they really could upset the ship of state in some unforetold circumstances, with multiparties entering into it, and all kinds of other considerations, including some personal animosity against a President-elect by an individual elector.

Now, the opponents of the idea of even wanting to make that particular kind of change will point to the fact that on only seven times out of the history of the United States, only seven electors have voted differently from what their State mandated, but that does not remove the possibility of mischief in future elections.

So I would ask for Members of the House who wish to join me in this venture to contact my office and ask to be placed as cosponsors on this legislation. I believe that if we do it during the current time, if we fully debate it and come up with solid recommendations, we will for all time for the future history of the United States finally make solid conclusions about the future of the electoral college.

It may be that the final result will be a reconfirmation of the present system in all its aspects, including the one to which I append my worries, or it may be that the recommendation will be for a direct election, which is the direct opposite of the present system. But whatever it is, I believe that this will be the final debate for all the history of the United States, and that it will enable us to proceed from election to election without the recurrence of ideas like mine to keep reviewing the electoral college.

I thank the Chair for allotting me this time, and, Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO MODIFY AND EXTEND PRICE-ANDERSON ACT

(Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker. I have introduced in the House on January 3, H.R. 51, a bill to modify and extend the Price-Anderson Act. Along with my former colleague and true friend, the late Senator Clint Anderson, of New Mexico, I am proud to have played a part in the design and original enactment of this legislation in 1957. I was involved in subsequent extensions and improvements, and am pleased once again to have the opportunity to recommend this further extension.

The Price-Anderson Act assures substantial financial protection to the public in the event of bodily injury or property damage caused by a nuclear accident. Originally enacted in 1957, Price-Anderson is currently incorporated in section 170 of the Atomic Energy Act, as amended. Subsection (c) of that section provides coverage for nuclear powerplants and certain other facilities and activities licensed by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. Subsection (d) of section 170 provides coverage for contractors to the Department of Energy who are engaged in hazardous nuclear activities. Originally enacted for a 10-year period, Price-Anderson has twice been extended for additional 10-year periods. Unless Congress acts, the authority of the NRC and the DOE to continue to provide Price-Anderson agreements to licensees and contractors after August 1, 1987, will expire; coverage would continue for NRC licensees and DOE contractors already covered on that date.

Price-Anderson deserves to be renewed and extended for one compelling reason: It provides much more realistic protection to the public than would be available in its absence and it does so in a most economically efficient manner that is consistent with our free market economy.

PRICE-ANDERSON COVERAGE

As modified by the Congress over the years, Price-Anderson embodies a closely integrated package that balances the benefits of public protection features against a level of remotely possible financial exposure for the industry. Price-Anderson assures the availability of a large sum of money to compensate any member of the public who has suffered a loss. If a nuclear accident happened today the amount available would be $605 million, composed of a primary layer of insurance of $160 million and assessments on each licensed reactor of $5 million, for an additional $425 million. This amount will increase by $5 million with each new reactor licensed to operate. Balanced against these public protection features, Price-Anderson limits the financial exposure of the industry to the amount of funds available pursuant to its provisions. In the case of DOE contract indemnity, a ceiling is also placed on the amount of Government liability. In any event, the act specifies that in the event of a nuclear incident involving damages in excess of the amount of aggregate liability, the Congress will thoroughly review the particular incident and will take whatever action is deemed necessary and appropriate to protect the public.

The NRC has recommended to Congress that Price-Anderson be extended to cover licenses issued after August 1, 1987, but it has also recommended that the overall ceiling on liability be eliminated in favor of an annual limit of $10 million per reactor/per incident/per year until all liability claims are paid. The Department of Energy has also recommended to Congress that Price-Anderson be extended, including limitation on liability, and that some parity be maintained with the commercial coverage. Several bills before the last Congress would simply have eliminated any limits on liability. In addition, opponents of Price-Anderson have contended that Congress should just let the act expire since no new reactor orders are currently contemplated.

CONGRESS MUST ACT

The arguments for Congress simply letting Price-Anderson expire are not persuasive. In the event of expiration, plants already covered by Price-Anderson would continue to enjoy that protection for the full term of their licenses. If, as I believe, nuclear power will play a continuing role in meeting our Nation's expanding energy needs, it would not make sense to have one regime of liability for plants licensed before August 1, 1987, and a different regime for plants licensed after that date. Moreover, I believe expiration would have a seriously adverse impact on the national defense and security, since it would terminate the DOE's authority to provide indemnity coverage to Federal Government contractors engaged in certain defense and other hazardous nuclear activities.

Some of those who hold a different view of the need for the nuclear program contend, however, that there would not be two different regimes of liability, since the unavailability of Price-Anderson would assure that no more plants would be ordered. Admittedly, the industry originally sought enactment of Price-Anderson to ameliorate the liability concerns which they saw as a bar to commercial participation in the technologically new nuclear program.

Whether, in light of the development of the technology over the years and the industry's greater experience in dealing with it, liability concerns continue to be of the same magnitude is not easily ascertainable considering the diversity of companies that now make up the "nuclear industry." Whatever the answer to that question may be, the rules of liability ought to be the same for all licensed nuclear plants, regardless of when they are brought into service.

The most important issue in deciding if Price-Anderson should be extended is whether it continues to achieve its primary statutory objective of assuring adequate compensation to the public in the case of a nuclear accident, and whether it does so in an economically efficient manner.

The extent of damages that would result from a worst-case nuclear accident has been the subject of a number of studies over the past 30 years. Upper estimates range to billions of dollars and numerous injuries and deaths, but with extremely low probabilities of an accident of such magnitude actually occurring. An accident of such magnitude would clearly result in Government intervention, with or without Price-Anderson. On the other hand, preliminary data resulting from research underway into probable accident consequences initiated after the Three Mile Island accident suggest that damages resulting from a serious nuclear accident may be more in the range of other types of nonnuclear industrial accidents. These issues will undoubtedly continue to be debated for some time and, I predict, on a theoretical basis, because the industry will continue to experience a fine record of avoidance of injury or property loss to the public or environmental damage. Whatever the outcome, Price-Anderson provides an efficient and equitable system for redressing nuclear-caused damages. In that regard, it is significant that the Supreme Court has already found that Price-Anderson, including the limit on liability, provides a reasonable substitute to the common law remedies that would prevail in its absence. [Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental State Group, Inc., 438 U.S. 59 (1978).]

AN ECONOMICALLY EFFICIENT SYSTEM

In enacting Price-Anderson, the Congress sought to minimize Federal intrusion on State law while at the same time assuring compensation no matter where claimants were located or who is responsible for their injuries. The principal technique embodied in Price-Anderson to accomplish this is the so-called omnibus coverage. Simply stated, the omnibus feature provides that the nuclear insurance policy and indemnity agreement cover the liability not only of the named insured, that is, the utility licensee or Government contractor, but also any other person who might become liable as a result of the accident in question. Thus, all subtier contractors and suppliers, including nuclear steam supply system vendors, architect-engineers, and constructors are covered under a single liability policy and a single indemnity agreement. This omnibus feature provides important benefits to claimants in situations where the only person liable for the accident might be underinsured, uninsured, or even judgment-proof. It also has important implications in terms of economic efficiency and maximizing insurance capacity.

A principal benefit of the "omnibus" Price-Anderson system is that it achieves a true economic efficiency by avoiding the layering of insurance premiums and/or risk factors in pricing. It does this by effectively "channelling" financial liability to the licensee operating the nuclear powerplant. The limitation on liability is the essential ingredient that permits this channelling of financial liability and which, in the case of utility licensees, results in the maximization of insurance capacity that can be devoted to any single accident. I believe that removal of the liability limitation would not only destroy the basis and rationale for this omnibus feature of Price-Anderson, but would actually decrease the amount of insurance available to injured parties and increase premiums, since available insurance funds and premiums would then be allocated among a number of potential defendants.

I have mentioned a few of the many reasons why proposals simply to remove the liability limitation and leave all of the other features of Price-Anderson in place do not make sense. Such proposals must be considered in the broad context of their impact on the delicate balance of all of the mutually interdependent elements that constitute the Price-Anderson system.

NRC PROPOSAL

The NRC has proposed what it appears to believe is a compromise between the existing Price-Anderson system and a simple deletion of the limitation on liability. Under this approach, NRC would remove the overall ceiling on liability but impose an assessment on each reactor of $10 million per year/per incident, until all liability claims have been paid. However, rather than being a compromise, this approach goes well beyond simply making each licensee fully liable for its own conduct, as most of the critics of the liability limit have proposed, and makes every licensee liable without limit for the actions of every other licensee. That is a proposal that has no precedent in law or public policy. While under the present Price-Anderson statutory scheme, all licensees are subject to a retrospective assessment in the case of an accident that exceeds amounts available through the primary insurance layer, the assessment is for a predictable and set amount. There is no reasonable or practical basis for making all licensees liable for an unlimited amount, even if payments in any one year are limited. Such a liability is not compatible with the enterprise-type liability assumed by nuclear utilities under the present Price-Anderson system and I believe it would be validly objected to by those utilities, their ratepayers and stockholders, and the State regulatory commissions. Such industrywide, openended liability could well act as an effective and unwarranted bar to the further use of nuclear power in this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the Price-Anderson system embodied in current law, including a limitation on liability, strikes an appropriate and equitable balance between the interests of the public and those who are charged with the responsibility for supplying our Nation with an adequate supply of electricity, a significant percentage of which is derived from nuclear power. Its unique features, and specifically its omnibus coverage, have made possible economic efficiencies that are consistent with the free market philosophy. It is for these reasons that I have introduced H.R. 51 to revise and extend Price-Anderson.

PROVISIONS OF H.R. 51

Section (1) of H.R. 51 extends the authority of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Department of Energy to enter into contracts of indemnity pursuant to subsections 170 (c) and (d) of the Atomic Energy Act, respectively, for an additional 10-year period beyond the current expiration date of August 1, 1987. While I believe that the Price-Anderson system has withstood the test of time and deserves to be extended permanently, the 10-year renewal periods have provided convenient intervals for the Congress to review its operation and to make such modifications as contemporary circumstances may suggest. In order to assure a meaningful and informed opportunity for such continued congressional review, H.R. 51 renews the mandate to the NRC and DOE to report to the Congress several years in advance of its next expiration on the need for continuation or modification of Price-Anderson. Pursuant to section (5), such a report must be filed with the Congress not later than August 1993.

Section (2) of the bill provides, for persons holding certain licenses issued by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, that the retrospective premium adjustment that may be assessed following a nuclear accident be increased from the current $5 million per incident to $10 million per incident. This retrospective premium adjustment was established by the Congress at the time of Price-Anderson's last extension in 1975. At that time, the overall limit of liability remained at the $560 million level established when Price-Anderson was initially enacted in 1957, but it was intended that the limit would float above this amount as additional reactors, each with the added assessment, were brought into service. Today, with the 89 licenses outstanding, the current $5 million assessment, plus the $160 million of available commercial insurance, has resulted in an increase in the overall liability limit to $605 million, a figure that will increase by $5 million with each additional reactor brought into service. My bill, by increasing the assessment to $10 million per reactor/per incident, would immediately raise the liability limitation to just over $1 billion, an amount which would also increase as additional reactors were licensed to operate.

While there is nothing magical about either the $5 million or $10 million level of assessments, my proposal is motivated by several important considerations. First, for the reasons I explained earlier, I believe retention of a limitation on liability is essential to the continued viability of the Price-Anderson indemnity system. My proposal accomplishes that objective. Second, $10 million represents the upper reaches of the assessment that can be imposed with the assurance that the funds will actually be available when needed. This fact is documented in appendix H to the NRC report entitled "The Price-Anderson Act—the Third Decade," submitted to the Congress in December 1983. That report shows that beyond the $10 million figure, certain licensees might not have the financial ability to pay. This has been confirmed by representatives of the utility industry who testified before Congress in both 1981 and 1984 that while a $10 million assessment would be manageable, payment of an assessment beyond that amount would not be possible for all licensees. Moreover, I believe that the billion-dollar fund that would result from the $10 million assessment represents an amount equivalent to the single largest risk for which insurance is currently available, that is, for third-party liability claims resulting from aircraft accidents. Finally, as was true when the Price-Anderson Act was originally enacted, and when each revision of the act was subsequently effected, I believe the financial impact of my bill would be acceptable to the affected industry and serve to continue the general collaborative concept that has worked so well to date, rather than to provide a basis for a lawsuit challenging the unilateral right of the Government to increase the heretofore agreed-to assessment.

Section (3) of H.R. 51 addresses the issue of the indemnification of Federal Government contractors. This issue is of great importance to me personally, and to the Armed Services Committee, since it involves activities vital to the national defense and security. Unlike the commercial reactor program, where some have argued that the failure of Congress to extend Price-Anderson would have no practical consequence because no new reactor orders are on the horizon, failure to extend the contractor provisions would immediately disrupt the ongoing DOE contractor program.

In 1957, the Government's indemnity for both the licensee and contractor programs was fixed at $500 million and it was also mandated that licensees purchase the $60 million of commercial insurance then available. This relationship between licensee and contractor limits was maintained until 1983 when the licensee liability limit floated above the $560 million level. Today, licensee coverage has risen to $605 million while contractor limits remain at $500 million. H.R. 51 would increase the contractor limit to $1 billion, or approximately the same level as proposed for licensees. This is consistent with the recommendation of the Department of Energy that some parity be maintained between the licensee and contractor coverage, so that the level of compensation remains independent of the source of the accident, be it a Government or a commercial activity. While it is true that the licensee limit will continue to increase as more reactors are licensed to operate, there does not appear to be any sound rationale for tying contractor coverage directly to the increase in the number of operating reactors. Moreover, the relatively few additional reactors expected to come on line in the next decade assures that some parity will be maintained between licensee and contractor coverage until Congress again has an opportunity to review the entire situation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that with the modifications I have proposed in H.R. 51, the Price-Anderson compensation system will continue to serve the best interests of the public and the Nation in the coming decade. I look forward to its early enactment.●

BIPARTISAN COMMISSION ON THE DEFICIT

(Mr. NELSON of Florida asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which would set up a bipartisan Commission on the Deficit.

We have been successful with this commission approach in the past when a political situation reached a crisis stage—in 1983 when the recommendations of the bipartisan Social Security Commission were endorsed by both the Congress and President. Now our budget deficit is at the crisis stage with no real relief in sight.

The deficit issue is not a partisan issue, nor should it be—too much is at stake. This Commission would provide a framework that would allow members from both parties and from the Congress and the executive branch, as well as private citizens, to roll up their sleeves and attack the issue in a bipartisan manner.

We cannot count on economic growth to "grow" us to a balanced budget—unless we are willing to wait for a long time or anticipate a growth that is many times the projected growth. In fact, the deficit itself tends to stifle the very growth needed to deal with it—a sort of economic catch-22. Federal borrowing now gobbles up 4 to 5 percent of the gross national product and from one-half to two-thirds of this country's net national saving. That saving will, therefore, not be available to support productive investment, which is the only way that we can insure long-term economic growth.

Everyone in Washington marveled at how well the bipartisan Commission on Social Security worked early in 1983. This was possible because each individual on that Commission had to give up something to save the Social Security Program. A Deficit Commission can work the same way.

A text of my bill follows:

H.R. —

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE TRADE DEFICIT

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, December 26, 1984, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE TRADE DEFICIT

This year Americans will buy $130 billion more in goods from the rest of the world than we will sell outside our borders. Just a few years ago, it was inconceivable that the United States could run a trade deficit of this magnitude. Now, we face the prospect of an ever-widening gap, which could top $200 billion by 1986. These figures represent a stunning and historic reversal of America's international trade position. The questions for us are: What are the causes of this deficit? What are its economic implications? What needs to be done to reduce it?

There are basically three reasons for the unprecedented trade deficit: the value of the dollar against other currencies; the pace and timing of our recovery compared to the rest of the world; and the international debt problem in Latin America. All three of these conditions can be linked to the U.S. federal budget deficit, now estimated to be around $210 billion.

The strong dollar is the most important factor, accounting for fully half of our trade deficit. Since 1980, the dollar's real value has increased 60% against the other major currencies. It is estimated to be "overvalued" by around 35%, which means that all exports which Americans want to sell abroad have, in effect, a 35% hidden tax on them. Of equal importance, foreign goods competing with American-made goods in domestic markets carry a hidden subsidy of the same amount.

High interest rates are the principal reason the dollar is so strong. As long as foreign investors can get 12% interest on investments in the U.S., compared to, say, 6% in Germany, demand for dollars will continue, and the dollar's value will remain high. Some of this strength in the dollar is warranted by favorable economic and political conditions in the U.S. relative to other countries. Deregulation of our financial markets has also encouraged international demand for the dollar, since it allowed U.S. banks to pay higher interest rates on deposits.

The second reason for our large trade deficit is that the U.S. economic recovery has been stronger, and has started earlier, than the recoveries of our major trading partners. Over the past two years, the U.S. economy has been growing at an average rate of 6-7%. By contrast, Western European countries have barely managed 2% real growth. Rapid growth at home has fueled demand for cheap imports, while sluggish growth abroad has meant fewer American exports. One exception is Japan, which has been growing at a rate more comparable to our own. However, its strong growth rate has not translated into increased U.S. exports because of closed Japanese markets, as well as the overvalued dollar.

The third reason for our burgeoning trade deficit is the international debt problem, particularly in Latin America. In the late 1970s, these countries were important and growing markets for U.S. goods. The exploding debts of the developing countries put a halt to this positive trend. From 1981 to 1983, our trade balance with the major Latin American countries deteriorated a staggering $20 billion, from a surplus of $5.8 billion to a deficit of $14.5 billion, because these countries could not afford to buy our goods.

The next question is: What are the economic implications of these enormous trade deficits? Surprisingly, they are not all bad. They help fight inflation. The strong dollar makes imports relatively cheap. American manufacturers have had to cut prices and improve productivity to keep pace with the foreign competition. Our trade deficits also have helped developing countries deal with their enormous debt burdens. These countries must export more than they import if they are to earn the foreign exchange to pay their debts. Our strong demand for imports has provided them with markets for their goods, and eased the problems associated with their massive debts.

But the negative implications of the trade deficit outweigh the positive. Simply stated, the trade deficit means lost economic growth, lost business profits, and lost American jobs. The trade deficit contributed to the severity of our recent recession, and is now contributing to the anemic peformance of the economy. In the third quarter of 1984, domestic demand rose at a healthy 5.7% but gross national product rose a paltry 1.9% because imports met so much of the demand. In 1983, the trade deficit cost American workers some 1.7 million jobs, and in 1984 it will result in a loss of 3 million jobs.

Even more disturbing are the implications for America's ability to remain a viable economic competitor in world markets for years to come. Until corrected, it will cost even more jobs as American industries shift production overseas. Because of the overvalued dollar, many industries which were once competitive are now losing out to foreign competition. For every telephone system, nuclear power station, or computer that U.S. firms do not sell abroad or at home, they have that fewer dollars to invest in their future.

The final question is: What needs to be done to reduce the trade deficit? The single most important step is to cut the federal budget deficit, a root cause of many of the world's economic problems. Our budget deficit is being financed largely by huge capital flows from abroad, attracted by our high interest rates. As a result, demand for the dollar and its value stay high, helping to produce our staggering trade deficit. Moreover, while this foreign money helps pay for our profligate ways at home, it saps economic strength from Western European and developing countries, key markets for our goods.

The remedy for our trade deficit is to immediately start cutting the federal budget deficit. This would permit interest rates to decline and would promote an ordely correction of the value of the dollar. To be sure, other trade measures are necessary, such as trade credits for developing countries, further negotiations to open foreign markets, and tax reform to enhance competitiveness. But all these measures combined will have limited impact compared to prompt and significant action to reduce the budget deficit.●

A PROPOSAL FOR A NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF ARTHRITIS AND MUSCULOSKELETAL DISEASES

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I come to you today with an important bit of unfinished business. I regret to have to report to some 37 million Americans—including a quarter of a million children—that despite our persistent efforts we have not been able to see the enactment of legislation that could bring new hope for the alleviation of their suffering. I refer, of course, to the goal we shared—the establishment of a new and distinct National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal Diseases.

Unfortunately, despite strong bipartisan support in both the House and Senate in recent years, and despite the many hours of work invested in the enactment of the legislation we developed, events have put our goal beyond our reach. In the recently concluded 98th Congress, this measure passed both the House and the Senate as part of a health policy package, but was vetoed by the President. Many of us in the House were disappointed to see a measure of such consequence rejected. But we are ready to take up the cause once more.

As many of my colleagues are aware, I have long supported research on arthritis, which is one of the cruelest and most prominent robbers of the health and well-being of the elderly.

As author of the legislation which created the original Arthritis Institute in 1950, I cherished the hope that by now we would have discovered the causes of arthritis and brought about a cure or, at the very least, learned to treat it effectively. While there has been considerable progress in areas such as joint replacement, we are nowhere near the goals we established more than three decades ago.

In past years my Subcommittee on Health and Long-Term Care has monitored the state of the art in arthritis research and the adequacy of Federal support for this endeavor. We have heard compelling testimony from victims of arthritis and nationally prominent medical researchers. From this evidence grew my determination that we establish a new and more direct focus on arthritis.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

I strongly believe that goal can only be accomplished by the creation of a separate Institute.

Over the years the purpose of the original Arthritis Institute has been obscured as the Institute has swelled to become the Institute of Arthritis, Diabetes, and Digestive and Kidney Diseases, bringing 10 different categories of unrelated diseases under one umbrella. In recent years, arthritis has slipped further and further down the totem poll in visibility and support. Only 12.9 percent of the current Institute's budget is devoted to arthritis and related diseases—and a slim 1.5 percent of the overall NIH budget is spent for this purpose.

Nearly everyone has a relative or friend who suffers the ravages of arthritis pain. Arthritis and related diseases afflict more than 37 million Americans. Arthritis limits the mobility of more people than any other disease. Sixteen million Americans—most of them elderly—have osteoarthritis, but arthritis is not exclusively a disease afflicting the elderly; 250,000 children suffer from juvenile arthritis. Yet, funding for research to attack the causes of arthritis and to identify treatments and cures for this epidemic disease has been pitifully small. The National Institutes of Health expend only about $1.70 per arthritis sufferer. This level of effort contrasts sharply with the economic cost of arthritis. Current estimates indicate that arthritis and musculoskeletal diseases now cost the Nation some $30 billion every year. A study in one State found that fully half of all workers' compensation claims are arthritis related. The cost of workers' compensation to insurance carriers—and thus to employers—resulting from arthritis and other musculoskeletal conditions is over $200 million in California alone.

Musculoskeletal conditions rank first among all disease groups in cost attributable to lost earnings and services from nonfatal illness, and they rank second only to circulatory diseases in total economic cost. Such conditions account for 20 percent of Medicare hospitalization costs, in excess of $1.2 billion each year.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is imperative that we renew our efforts of the past and make certain that this is the year in which we commit ourselves to a war on arthritis. Many research scientists believe they are very close to identifying the causes of various forms of arthritis. With an accelerated effort by the NIH, prevention, improved treatments and cures now are in the realm of the possible. Some of the areas under active exploration include those related to abnormalities of the body's immune system and the role of the particular viruses and collagens; the interrelationship between sex hormone activity and immunological and genetic factors; tissue and bone transplantations; and many others.

We must say to the 37 million Americans suffering from these disorders that hope is on the way. The way to do this is to launch a vigorous attack against rheumatic diseases and other musculoskeletal diseases. The instrument for this attack should be the creation of a National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal Diseases.

My bill would create such an institute within the National Institutes of Health. It is patterned on the statutory authority of other NIH research institutes. It is based upon, and follows, an evolutionary threat of existing law beginning with the National Arthritis Act, a 1975 measure which established a National Commission on Arthritis. That Commission was charged with the development of a long-range arthritis plan with specific recommendations for the use and organization of national resources to combat arthritis.

Unfortunately, neither the National Arthritis Act nor the plan the law mandated has come close to being implemented. Because of this, and because the need is so great, a sharp new focus on arthritis is imperative.

The legislation I propose would direct the new Institute to undertake research and demonstrations relating to the cause, prevention, and treatment of arthritis and musculoskeletal diseases; to promote coordination of research programs in the public and private sector; to make grants for research; to establish an information clearinghouse; and to conduct research training.

The Director of the new Institute would be charged with developing a plan for a national program to expand, intensify, and coordinate activities of the Institute and to carry out the plan. The national program is expected to encompass: research in the epidemiology, etiology, and prevention of arthritis and musculoskeletal diseases; development, trial, and evaluation of drugs and devices; refinement, development, and evaluation of implants and prosthetic devices; and establishment of methods for monitoring the causes of athletic injuries and preventing such injuries, as sport-related disorders would also be a focus of the new Institute.

The bill authorizes support for new and existing multipurpose arthritis and musculoskeletal disease research centers and provides a specific funding authorization. It also establishes an interagency coordinating committee, chaired by the Director of the Institute, the mission of which is to improve coordination of all research and services programs relating to arthritis and musculoskeletal diseases.

Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely convinced that the creation of a National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal Diseases will result in major advances in the prevention, treatment, and cure of the most widespread of diseases afflicting Americans. The current level of funding or only a modest increase for research on rheumatic and musculoskeletal diseases, along with the increased visibility a separate Institute would provide, offer the potential for great human and economic benefit to the Nation.

I welcome cosponsors of this legislation and urge my colleagues to add their support to this important proposal.●

RESOLUTION ON FUSION ENERGY RESEARCH AND TECHNOLOGY

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following:

H.J. Res. —

Joint resolution urging formation of a national policy and renewal of national attention on the future of fusion energy research, technology and development and the possibilities of increased international cooperation in such efforts

Whereas, the United States should continue to sustain the momentum of physics and scientific research efforts which could lead to the necessary technological base for a commercial fusion energy option; and

Whereas, budget projections for the next round of fusion test experiments and facilities are substantially larger than in the past, and budget restrictions in the United States and several other nations during the 1980's may impede individual domestic fusion efforts, thereby threatening fusion technology's progress; and

Whereas, the United States has successfully joined with other nations in the past to coordinate research and development techniques; and

Whereas, international communication, information exchanges and collaboration have been effective in refining and improving various fusion options, such as tandem mirrors and tokomaks, and in reducing the amount of duplication and total costs of such projects; and

Whereas, the state of fusion research in the United States, Japan, the European Community and the Soviet Union is such that the Committee on International Cooperation in Magnetic Fusion believe that a "window of time" now exists for the initiation of large scale collaboration: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives and the Senate in Congress assembled, That the United States government should continue its historical commitment to the pursuit of fusion energy research and technology by establishing a clear set of policies, objectives and budgets for future U.S. fusion activities and should take the lead in consulting with prospective partners to initiate an international joint planning effort aimed at large scale collaboration.●

A TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM J. KEENAN

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I call attention to a respected citizen from Illinois' Fifth Congressional District, which I am privileged to represent, and he is Bill Keenan. Bill has consistently shown that our community's youth is in good hands with dedicated educators such as himself.

Bill has worked for the Chicago Board of Education for 28 years as a high school teacher, counselor, and assistant principal. The last 19 years he has worked for the community's youth at John F. Kennedy High School.

During a period from 1965 to 1976, he served—in what he describes as the most rewarding experience of his 28 years of educational work—as the counselor for the Kelly High School Adult Education Program, which assisted over 500 adults in realizing an important goal of obtaining their high school diploma. He was especially gratified to assist so many adults who were unable to complete their education due to family problems, language barriers, or military service.

Bill feels that Kennedy High School is now entering a timely renaissance period—the Community High School concept—which has an innovative curriculum that will appeal to a variety of students, coupled with the proper leadership, long-range planning, available resources, and a concerned staff and community for a successful future.

I join with the residents of the Fifth Congressional District in paying tribute to William J. Keenan for his work in our behalf, and I would like to introduce into today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a newspaper article honoring Bill Keenan upon his receipt of the Ray McDonald Community Achievement Award.

[From the Midway Sentinel, September 1984]

McDONALD HONORS TO KEENAN

The Midway Sentinel proudly salutes area educator, William J. Keenan, as this months recipient of the Ray McDonald Community Achievement Award. Bill Keenan has worked for the Chicago Board of Education for 28 years as a high school teacher, counselor and assistant principal. The last nineteen years he has worked with our community's youth at John F. Kennedy High School. "It does not seem possible that I have begun my 29th year," he observed. "I can vividly remember my first day at JFK, September 7th 1965."

Bill Keenan began his career in 1956 as a math, woodworking and drafting teacher at Calumet High School; in 1963 he was appointed to the position of Guidance Counselor. In September of '65 he transferred to Kennedy and in January, 1968, Miss Dorothy Sauer, Superintendent of District No. 12, and then Kennedy's principal, promoted Bill to the position of Assistant Principal in charge of Guidance and Student Activities.

During a period from 1965 to 1976, he served as the counselor for the Jelly High School Adult Education Program, assisting over 500 adults in realizing a long unfulfilled need and goal—their high school graduation. "It was one of the most rewarding experiences of my 28 years," he recalls, "counseling an incredible spectrum of adults: ages 18 to 65; many of whom previously attended school in other countries; most of whom were unable to complete their education due to family problems, language barrier, or military service." "One remarkable example remains a vivid memory—He was 72 years of age, a retired, immigrant barber who attended adult education programs for six years, four evenings a week, earning both elementary and high school diplomas." I selected him as the class speaker at the June '71 graduation," Keenan recalled. "More than 25 family members were present including grandchildren." He concluded his remarks by telling the packed auditorium he now felt like "A complete American—a graduate"!

During the past 19 years, Bill Keenan has developed and supervised several innovative programs at Kennedy: A model attendance office, a full service guidance department, a faculty/parent scholarship program, a parent/student handbook and faculty handbook, student award programs, elementary school/high school articulation and parent interview programs and a college and career conference program. In the spring of 1983, a group of alumni approached Bill about activating Kennedy's dormant Alumni Association. Their efforts resulted in a group known as the "Kennedy CRU" which has held two successful picnics attended by over 400 alumni.

Keenan feels that Kennedy High School is now entering a timely renaissance period. "The Community High School concept remains valid; with the addition of innovative curriculum that will appeal to a variety of students."

"Kennedy has always been unique because of its staff, parents and student body." "The infusion of leadership, long range planning, available resources and a concerned staff and community is the formula for the future."

Bill's efforts and concern for Kennedy's continued development and its importance to our community reflects the purpose of the Ray McDonald Award.●

INTRODUCTION OF THE STATE AND LOCAL NARCOTICS CONTROL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1985

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced the "State and Local Narcotics Control Assistance Act of 1985." This bill, which is similar to legislation I introduced in the 98th Congress, provides for grants to State and local governments to assist them in drug law enforcement and drug abuse treatment and prevention activities. This measure is offered in response to the critically high, and unacceptable levels of drug trafficking and drug abuse in the United States. Over 30 of our colleagues have joined me as cosponsors of this measure.

Drug trafficking has reached epidemic proportions in the United States; it is estimated to be a $100 billon per year business and is compounded by the economic and social costs to our Nation as a result of those who are adversely affected by illicit drug use. Drug use has escalated dramatically over the past two decades, particularly among our young people, and remains at unacceptably high levels. It is believed that the levels of illicit drug use in the United States exceed those in any other industrialized country in the world.

From 1978 to 1982, cocaine related deaths and emergency room episodes jumped 300 percent and remain high. Heroin related hospital emergencies rose nearly 80 percent nationally, and heroin overdose deaths increased almost 50 percent over the same period.

In the area of criminal justice, drug trafficking and drug abuse have inundated our law enforcement capabilities. In March 1983, the Department of Justice's Bureau of Criminal Justice Statistics reported that almost one-third of all State prisoners in 1979 were under the influence of an illegal drug when they committed the crimes for which they were incarcerated. The study also revealed that the more convictions inmates had on their records, the more likely they were to have taken drugs during the month prior to the offense.

During the 98th Congress, the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, which I chair, held hearings around the country receiving the opinions, thoughts, and suggestions of local law enforcement officers, judges, correction officials, and drug abuse treatment and prevention specialists on methods to address the burgeoning problems of drug abuse and drug-related crime. In addition, the Select Committee closely examined the efforts of our Federal law enforcement agencies to interdict and disrupt the major drug trafficking networks responsible for the importation of narcotics into our country. We also reviewed the efforts of the State Department and our diplomatic initiatives to eliminate the production of narcotics and other illicit drugs in foreign source countries. I have come to the conclusion, as a result of the Select Committee's investigations that we have been largely unsuccessful in controlling the production of illegal drugs in source countries, and that we have been totally unable to interdict an appreciable amount of illegal drugs coming into this country through Federal law enforcement efforts. As a result, we have been unable to make any significant reduction in the available supply of narcotics on the streets of the United States.

What has happened, is that our local law enforcement agencies and drug abuse service programs have been left with the responsibility to respond to the increasing volume of illegal drugs being trafficked across the country and related criminal activity, as well as the great public health care demand that addicts and substance abusers create.

Our local police, prosecutors, judges, jails, and prisons have all been overwhelmed by a continous surge of drug-related criminal defendants. The criminal justice system, as a result, has been forced to make the critical decisions of arrest, bail, probation, and sentence based on the size of the case load. Drug trafficking has forced our local criminal justice systems to be concerned with the quantity of defendants, rather than the quality of justice.

States and localities are also simply unable to meet the growing demand for drug abuse treatment and prevention services. This is especially true in many of our Nation's large urban areas that are hardest hit by drug abuse. Over 94 percent of the States responding to a 1983 survey conducted by the National Association of State Alcohol and Drug Abuse Directors reported an unmet need for treatment and prevention services in their States.

The inability of our diplomatic initiatives to control the production and trafficking of illegal drugs abroad, as well as the ineffectiveness of our Federal interdiction and enforcement efforts to restrict the entry and distribution of narcotics in our country, make it urgently necessary that the Federal Government come to the assistance of State and local agencies that are bearing the large burden of responding to drug abuse in America.

The legislation I have introduced today authorizes $750 million annually in fiscal years 1986 through 1990 to help States and localities increase their efforts to control drug abuse and drug trafficking. The funds provided under my bill would be made available to States on the basis of demonstrated need, taking into account the severity of drug trafficking and abuse within a State and the availability of State and local resources to resolve these problems.

Specifically, the bill authorizes the Attorney General to make grants to States for five general purposes related to increasing the level of State and local drug law enforcement. These purposes include:

Providing additional personnel, equipment, facilities, training, and supplies to State and local narcotics enforcement units for more widespread apprehension of drug criminals;

Providing similar support to increase the prosecution of narcotics cases in State courts;

Providing additional support to State courts to increase the number of narcotics cases that can be adjudicated and reduce delays that often leave drug peddlers free to ply their trade pending trial;

Increasing the capacity of State correctional facilities to hold convicted drug felons and providing support to establish and improve drug treatment and rehabilitation services to drug dependent State offenders; and Providing increased support for States to eradicate illicit drug cultivation.

The bill includes $125 million a year for each of these general purposes and gives the Attorney General limited flexibility to shift funds among these purposes. This will allow the Attorney General to increase funds available for purposes that may have a greater need, but the bill will also assure that funds are used by States to increase all components of their criminal justice systems.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary of Health and Human Services to make grants to States to increase the availability of drug abuse prevention, treatment, and rehabilitation programs. The bill authorizes $125 million a year over the same 5-year period for this purpose. As a result of Federal budget cuts, States are currently unable to meet the demand for treatment and rehabilitation, a demand which is growing. With the increased drug law enforcement activity this bill will make possible, the need for additional treatment capacity will grow. My bill is intended to assure that these increased drug abuse services will be available to help those who need and want such help. Efforts must also be increased to prevent our citizens, especially our young people, from becoming involved with drugs.

The effects of drug abuse and drug trafficking continue to grow, sapping our Nation of its most valuable resource—our people—and threatening the very security of our country. We can never hope to bring these problems under control unless we are willing to make a serious, long-term commitment to provide the substantial resources needed to do the job. My bill makes a strong start toward the goals of eliminating the drug trade that pervades our streets, helping drug abuse victims become productive members of our society and preventing the further spread of drug abuse. I urge my colleagues to join me in passing this vital legislation.●

THE RANKING GAME

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Thursday, January 3, 1985 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

The report follows:

THE RANKING GAME

Magazines, government agencies, and business development groups have discovered a public appetite for "rankings," the scales which compare and contrast the fifty states on just about anything one can imagine. Indeed, the "ranking game" has become a national sport, with states' reputations increasingly on the line. Despite criticism from economists, demographers, and other experts, corporate executives, public officials, and ordinary citizens are now turning to rankings as a means of making important decisions—where to invest, where to send relief funds, or where to seek a new home and job.

Let's look at some of these rankings, and how Indiana fares:

BUSINESS

Probably the most widely recognized business ranking is issued annually by Alexander Grant & Company, a Chicago accounting firm. The firm sizes up the general manufacturing climate around the country by grading states on 22 factors in five categories, including state-regulated employment costs, state and local fiscal policies, cost, availability, and productivity of labor, and a catch-all category called "other manufacturing-related issues" that encompasses energy costs, environmental requirements, and population trends. Florida places first in the Grant ranking with 79.4 out of a maximum of 100 points. At the other end of the spectrum is Michigan with 11.8 points. Indiana's score of 49.8 puts it in the middle in 25th place.

Fortune's listing (by assets) of the nation's 500 largest industrial companies is another traditionally recognized ranking that can be broken down state by state. New York has 84 corporate headquarters within its boundaries, more than any other state. Many states, including Utah and Maine, have none and do not rank at all. Indiana hosts nine such headquarters, and is in 15th place on the list. Yet another traditionally recognized ranking is Business Week's annual review of the location and assets of the nation's top 200 banks. New York comes in first with 23 big banks, California is second with 11, Indiana stands in 11th position with three. Inc., a business magazine, surveys the small-business climate in its "Annual Report on the States." Inc. rates Texas as most conducive to the growth of small business, while Wisconsin is the least profitable location. Indiana ranks 18th.

Rankings such as these are not without controversy. One problem is that businesses rely on them when selecting a site for relocation. The top states attract all the business, and states ranking in the high-40s are left standing like surplus boys after sides are picked for basketball. Thus, the rankings reinforce a cycle whereby the highest- and lowest-ranking states become more entrenched in their places with the rankings of each passing year.

STRESS

Researchers at the University of New Hampshire have attempted to measure the amount of "stress" felt by people living in different states by looking at the number of strikes, bankruptcies, divorces, foreclosures, and the like. The least stressful state, scoring 16 is Nebraska. At the other end of the scale, Nevada gets 100. Indiana is on the relaxed end of the spectrum with 40 points, 35th among the states. The state scoring closest to Indiana is Hawaii, which is only slightly less stressful.

TAXES

Hoosiers pay $584 per capita in state and local taxes, ranking 43rd in the country. While New Hampshire residents, who have the nation's lowest tax rate, pay $345, Alaskans take the lead with $4,487 per capita.

INCOME

According to the Bureau of Economic Analysis at the Department of Commerce, Alaskan citizens earn the most money annually, $16,820 per capita. The District of Columbia comes in second with $16,409. Indiana's average income of $10,567 puts it in 34th place. West Virginia comes in last at $8,937 per capita per year. Along the same lines, West Virginia has the highest poverty rate in the nation: 25% of its citizens are currently living below the poverty level. Connecticut has the lowest rate, 8.1%. With 12.6% of its citizens living in poverty, Indiana ranks 39th.

UNEMPLOYMENT

In unemployment, too, West Virginia comes in first with a 14.9% rate. Some 9.4% of the Hoosier population is out of work, and Indiana is high on the list in tenth place. Nebraska has the lowest jobless rate—4.1%.

EDUCATION

According to the Department of Education, Alaska spends the most on its students, $5,369 per pupil per year. Indiana ranks 39th with $2,008 spent on each student. Mississippi spends $1,685 per pupil, and ranks last in this survey. Another criterion used to rate education is the Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT), taken by high school seniors for use in their college applications. The students in New Hampshire rate highest on this test, scoring an average of 925 out of 1600 points. The average Hoosier student receives a score of 860, putting him in 17th position nationwide. The District of Columbia ranks lowest with an average score of 821.

VOTING

According to the Census Bureau, more people vote in South Dakota, 74.5%, than in any other state. Nevada's 49.3% turnout is the nation's poorest. Indiana ranks in the upper half with a 61.6% turnout.

The attention that the rankings attract will make state-by-state comparisons an effective publicity tool for years to come. There are legitimate questions about them, however. I frankly wonder if too much reliance is placed on this questionable "science" of rankings. My hunch is that where important choices are involved, decision makers should exercise great caution in their use of rankings. I remain skeptical that things like the quality of life can be quantified precisely.

The rankings interest me, but I suspect that most Hoosiers would be prepared to argue that Indiana is, all things considered and despite some of the rankings, a pretty good place to live.●

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF DR. ALFRED GOTTSCHALK

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to commend Dr. Alfred Gottschalk for his dedication and accomplishments in his 25 years of service to the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati. His devotion to the Jewish community and the college, which he serves as president, has resulted in the development of extensive educational programs for the study of Reform Judaism, enhanced interreligious communication and understanding, and increased participation of women in the rabbinate.

Dr. Alfred Gottschalk was born in Overwesel, Germany in 1930. He came to America as a youngster with his parents, who fled the Nazi government. He was ordained Rabbi in 1957 after completion of studies at the New York and Cincinnati schools of the College-Institute. The school, with campuses in Cincinnati, New York, Los Angeles, and Jerusalem is primarily a graduate institution that trains Reform rabbis, cantors, educators, and communal workers.

Dr. Gottschalk's myriad activities have earned him numerous fellowships, degrees, and awards, including a Smithsonian Institution Research Grant in 1963, election as an honorary fellow of the Hebrew Univeristy, Jerusalem, in 1977, and the degree of LL.D. from Xavier University in Cincinnati in 1981 after inaugurating Xavier's first chair of interreligious ecumenical studies. He has actively participated in many organizations related to both religious and secular causes. Currently, Dr. Gottschalk is a member of the United States Holocaust Memorial Council.

To be sure, the Jewish community in Cincinnati and throughout America has benefited from the enthusiasm and commitment of Dr. Gottschalk. But to laud him only for his accomplishments to the Jewish Reform movement would be less than complete. He has also sought to improve education, promote community service and involve women in the leadership of the Reform movement.

I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Dr. Gottschalk on his 25th anniversary with the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion. We are fortunate to have a man of his character residing and working in our community.

His emphasis on creating greater understanding and harmony among people of all races and religions cannot be better stated than by Dr. Gottschalk himself, when he says:

While we underscore the strongest concern for the survival of the Jewish people, we do not diminish our concern for the affairs of the general community and universal civilization. The two are interlocked and inseparable.●

TRANSITION RELIEF FOR CERTAIN FRINGE BENEFITS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing, along with Representatives ARCHER, CRANE, NELSON, GREEN of New York, THOMAS, ROE, and FIELDS, legislation to provide relief to a group of employees who have lost their nontaxable airline passes as a result of provisions of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984.

My Subcommittee on Select Revenue Measures of the Committee on Ways and Means spent over 1 year attempting to provide workable rules for the taxation of nonstatutory fringe benefits. It was our desire to end the series of congressionally imposed moratoriums in the area of fringe benefits and to establish clear and workable rules for which benefits were to be taxed and which were to be exempted. I think we accomplished this goal and the legislation was incorporated as part of the Deficit Reduction Act.

Unfortunately, the act had a somewhat unanticipated adverse effect on certain Pan Am World Services employees. The provisions of the act exclude from tax the value of certain no-additional-cost services which are provided to employees who work in the same line of business of the employer. The effect of this rule was to allow long-established fringe benefits, such as free airline passes to airline employees, to continue to remain exempt from tax. The line of business limitation was incorporated to prevent a conglomerate which had numerous lines of businesses from flowing back and forth a series of nontaxable benefits between its various subsidiaries. For example, an airline company might well own a hotel, a car rental agency, restaurants, and so forth, and provide an employee with free or discounted services in all these areas. Therefore, we felt that the line of business limitation was and is good tax policy. The legislation incorporated a limited exception to the line of business to the extent the benefit was available on a nondiscriminatory basis on January 1, 1984, and did not exceed 1 percent of aggregate payroll. Because of the uncertainty over valuation of free airline passes, it is questionable, and in fact, unlikely, that the Pan Am World Services employees could benefit from this limited line of business exemption. The legislation provides a narrow expansion of the line of business exemption to grandfather in Pan Am World Services employees prior to the date of reintroduction.

The legislation is unlikely to have any revenue impact since it is likely that failure to provide an exemption will merely result in the company canceling the benefit.

Pan Am World Services employees have long enjoyed access to free airline passes and many have made career decisions on the basis of access to this benefit. It seems to be unfair to now deny these benefits to current employees. This is not a major issue in the overall scheme of things, but it is a question of basic fairness to this group of employees. As of January 1, 1985, the new fringe benefit rules denying airline passes to these employees is in effect. I hope we can alleviate any hardship for these employees by speedy passage of this bill. I would also like to commend our colleague, Senator DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN, for his leadership on this issue in the Senate.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 531 of the Tax Reform Act of 1984 is amended by redesignating subsections (g) and (h) as subsections (h) and (i), respectively, and inserting after subsection (f) the following new subsection:

"(g) DETERMINATION OF LINE OF BUSINESS IN CASE OF AFFILIATED GROUP OPERATING AIRLINE.—If, as of September 12, 1984—

"(1) an individual was an employee (within the meaning of section 132 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, including subsection (1) thereof) of one member of an affiliated group (as defined in section 1504 of such Code) and was eligible for no-additional-cost services in the form of air transportation provided by another member of such affiliated group,

"(2) at least 50 percent of the individuals performing services for the first such corporation were or had been employees of or had previously performed services for the second such corporation, and

"(3) the primary business of the affiliated group was air transportation of passengers, then, for purposes of applying paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 132(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, with respect to no-additional-cost services and qualified employee discounts provided for such individual by such other member, the employer of such individual shall be treated as engaged in the same line of business as such other member. For purposes of the preceding sentence and section 132 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, and individual who is performing services for the first such corporation who is an employee of the second such corporation shall be treated as also an employee of the first such corporation."●

THE END OF MANDATORY RETIREMENT

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today legislation to abolish mandatory retirement and other forms of age discrimination in employment. I am joined in this effort by EDWARD R. ROYBAL, the chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, and MATTHEW RINALDO, the ranking minority member of the Aging Committee.

This bill is a very simple amendment to the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967. It merely removes the upper age of 70, thereby extending all protections of the act to workers age 70 and older. The bill does include a temporary exemption for tenured faculty of universities and colleges to allow the academic system to adjust to the elimination of mandatory retirement.

We know that age discrimination in employment is a major problem. In fiscal year 1983 the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which is charged with enforcement of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, received almost 15,000 charges of age discrimination. This represents a 66-percent increase over charges filed in fiscal year 1982 and a shocking increase of roughly 275 percent since 1979.

Age discrimination contributes to unemployment and other financial and psychological problems of older Americans. A study conducted by the House Select Committee on Aging in October 1982 found that unemployment among workers age 55 and older is growing faster than among all other age groups. Moreover, once unemployed, older workers remain out of a job much longer than younger workers. And, those age 60 and older are three times as likely as all other adults to give up and withdraw from the work force once they have become unemployed. As a result, there are more than 334,000 discouraged workers over the age of 55. When these discouraged workers are added to the officially unemployed, the number of jobless older person rises to more than 1.2 million.

Age discrimination prematurely severs older workers from their livelihood and from a sense of identity and identification with their community. It also creates economic havoc. Older workers who have become unemployed suffer from lower wages and lower job status if they are able to reenter the work force at all.

No legislation can completely solve a problem as pervasive as age discrimination in employment. The attitudes of employers and the public at large must be changed to reflect the changing realities of a more productive, capable and willing older worker. Negative stereotypes still abound and until these are eradicated we will be forced to contend with age discrimination in the workplace.

But research clearly shows that if we enact legislation to abolish mandatory retirement by the year 2000, more than 195,000 older workers will be able to remain in the work force. This simple change alone would add several billion dollars a year to the Social Security fund. According to official estimates by the Social Security Administration, the elimination of mandatory retirement would help to solve the long-term financing problem of Social Security. Removing obstacles that face older workers is a much better way of solving Social Security's problems than either raising the entitlement age, as was done by the Congress in 1983, or of reducing future benefits. The elimination of obstacles is a much more humane way to deal with declining labor force participation among older workers than the punitive measures that were included in the Social Security legislation of 1983.

Despite the widespread support for the elimination of mandatory retirement, there are critics of this legislation. Some members of the business community believe that the Age Discrimination in Employment Act provides too many rights to older workers. We have heard arguments that the right to a trial by jury, for example, provides a bias in favor of an older worker who brings a legal action against his employer. There is not a grain of evidence to support his allegation and certainly no evidence to suggest that older workers should be denied a fundamental right that is offered to all other Americans in most other parts of the law.

Another argument raised by some members of the business community is that damage awards allowed under ADEA are unfair. The liquidated damage award allowed by the ADEA is based on that available under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. Plaintiffs are entitled to such damage awards only if they can prove that the employer willfully violated the ADEA. This is reasonable protection and is not unfavorably biased against employers.

The legislation I am introducing today would not affect any of the basic protections that exist in the ADEA. It would merely expand the number of older workers who are protected by the act. Removing the upper age limit in the ADEA would add approximately 850,000 workers age 70 and over to the 28 million workers—age 40 to 70—now covered by the act. This would be about a 3-percent increase in the number of individuals protected against age discrimination in employment.

Another argument is that eliminating mandatory retirement would inhibit promotional opportunities for younger workers. The findings of the Labor Department refute this idea. One study reports that a 10-percent increase in the labor force participating rates of men age 65-plus—twice the projected impact of eliminating mandatory retirement—would delay, on average, promotions at the highest ranks by only one-half year, while at the lower ranks individual promotions would be retarded by approximately 5 to 10 weeks. These are insignificant effects, especially when weighted against the harmful consequences of forced retirement based on age.

There is, however, one group who face unique employment circumstances and who are, therefore, temporarily exempted from the protections of this legislation. These are tenured faculty of universities and colleges who, because of their unique tenure system, face a very different employment situation than most other workers. Arguments by representatives of both the academic institutions and faculty indicate that eliminating mandatory retirement at this time would be a significant threat to the tenure system and to academic freedom. This threat is compounded by the unique demographic situation facing colleges and universities, a situation which will diminish in importance over the next 15 years. Therefore, this bill includes an exemption for tenured faculty for the next 15 years, after which faculty will be extended all the protections of the ADEA after the age of 70. No other employment situation is comparable to academic institutions. Therefore, an exemption for any other group that is not already provided by the ADEA would be unacceptable.

It is my great hope that this legislation can be enacted as swiftly as possible. There are many thousands of older Americans who are capable of working and would like to remain productive members of their society. This legislation will open doors for these people, allowing them to make important contributions to the economy, to their own personal well-being and to the Social Security System.●

SOLID WASTE CRISIS

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, over the past several months, a great amount of attention has been devoted to New Jersey's solid waste crisis, its causes and possible solutions. It is clear to nearly all observers that the State's response to the need for solid waste management and planning could be detrimental, not only to the environment, but potentially to the public's health.

We all must realize the folly of disposing trash in landfills. Twenty percent of the most dangerous Superfund toxic waste sites began as so-called sanitary landfills.

However, the State department of environmental protection has continued to order the counties to site new landfills. County governing bodies rarely, if ever, have the necessary expertise in environmental matters, and thus are the least equipped to make these decisions. New Jersey has a sensitive geology and ecology, and any new landfills will inevitably result in a threat to our drinking water supplies.

A current policy of having the State coerce the counties in solid waste matters is, in itself, ironic. Under the Federal Resource Conservation and Recovery Act of 1976, the State is responsible for making landfill-siting decisons. A 1982 State supreme court ruling reaffirmed that mandate.

If New Jersey submitted to the Federal Environmental Protection Agency a solid waste management plan which relied on landfills sited over ground water supplies, it would be rejected. Yet, knowing that such a plan could never be approved, the DEP is ordering counties to do what it knew they were legally forbidden to do—locate landfills over aquifers or aquifer recharge areas.

This ill-advised policy has resulted from an unwillingness by the State to confront this complex issue and make difficult decisions to solve our solid waste problems—decisions that will undoubtedly leave some people unhappy. By ordering the counties to site inappropriate landfills, the State has insulated itself from the decisionmaking process. This has created the tragic contest of individuals and communities to avoid being the location for dumps.

What New Jersey sorely needs is a comprehensive, coordinated approach to solid waste management. A mandatory, statewide recycling program would comprise one part of that approach. Certain New Jersey municipalities have successfully implemented such programs, some of which have reduced their total amount of garbage by over 50 percent.

A second component involves the use of high technology resource recovery facilities, which can convert trash into energy in an environmentally safe manner. Resource recovery plants have been used successfully in Europe. These plants are our best hope to solve our disposal problems. Yet, we need to make sure appropriate controls are installed to prevent toxic emissions. Resource recovery plants need to be planned and implemented on a regional basis, not county-by-county. It is the only way we can ensure cost-effective operations.

These components, combined with sound management and rational decisionmaking by State officials, represent a viable comprehensive solid waste management program.

Of course, such a program will take time to implement. Until then, State officials should impose a solid waste emergency, to prevent New York and Pennsylvania from continuing to dump trash in our State. This will give us the time to plan for the implementation of better disposal systems. In addition, the State, by compliance with Federal law and refusing to site landfills over drinking water sources, will speed the movement toward mandatory recycling and resource recovery.

In conclusion, commonsense and the law dictate that the State has ultimate authority over interstate and intrastate waste flows. The differing economic and environmental conditions found in our 21 counties dictate a statewide approach to solid waste management. The Kean administration's policy of forcing the counties to make solid waste decisions may be politically clever, but it is legally and environmentally inappropriate.●

THE PROFESSIONAL SPORTS FRANCHISE STABILIZATION ACT OF 1985

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to benefit sports fans and protect communities that have professional baseball, basketball, football, and hockey teams.

My bill would prohibit professional sports franchises from moving to another city unless a team could demonstrate financial hardship or that it was compelled to play in inadequate facilities. The bill further would provide metropolitan areas with a right of first refusal before a team could relocate.

Professional football has attracted a lion's share of attention in recent years with the transfer of the Oakland Raiders franchise to Los Angeles, over the objection of the National Football League, and the midnight ride out of Baltimore last year by the Colts to Indianapolis.

Just last month, the Philadelphia Eagles came within an eyelash of moving to Phoenix, AZ. Although that move now appears to have been averted, the estimated cost to the city of Philadelphia to retain the Eagles may exceed "$30 million over the next 20 years," according to media accounts.

Since 1976, when the American Basketball Association merged with the National Basketball Association, several NBA teams also have relocated—the Buffalo Braves to San Diego in 1979, the New Orleans Jazz to Salt Lake City in 1980, and the San Diego Clippers to Los Angeles in 1984.

Just last year, the owners of the San Diego franchise moved the Clippers to Los Angeles without even seeking league approval. The NBA brought suit, seeking a declaratory judgment that would empower the league to consider its rules in determining where its member teams locate, that the league be allowed to terminate the Clippers' franchise, and for $25 million in damages.

There also have been transfers of professional hockey franchises since the World Hockey Association was merged into the National Hockey League in 1979. In 1980, the Atlanta Flames moved to Calgary, AB. In 1982, the Colorado Rockies, which had moved to Denver from Kansas City in 1976, tranferred to New Jersey.

More recently, the NHL refused to permit the owner of the St. Louis Blues to move the team out of St. Louis, which has supported the franchise since 1967. Instead, the league located a new owner committed to keeping the team in St. Louis. The NHL now is defending itself against a $60 million antitrust suit brought by the previous owner.

To be sure, teams have been moving from one city to another since the inception of professional sports leagues. Teams used to move only because fans in a particular city refused to support the team and the franchise lost money.

But what distresses me the most as a Member of Congress and a sports fan is that an owner no longer has to demonstrate that a lack of community support and financial hardships are present before relocating a sports franchise. Today, owners just pick up their franchise and run, or sell out to the highest bidder, leaving communities and the taxpayers holding the bag.

When the Raiders left Oakland after 22 years, and 12 years of sellouts in their stadium, they left Alameda County with a stadium valued at $75 million, long-term debt of $30 million to retire the construction bond obligation, and an estimated loss of between $30 million and $180 million annually in economic activity generated by the Raiders.

Until the Raiders court suit against the NFL, each of the leagues to which this legislation applies had its own regulations to control the relocation of its member teams. But with the exception of baseball, which enjoys an exemption from the antitrust laws, Federal court rulings in the Raiders case and other pending litigation have cast doubt on the ability of the leagues to regulate franchise transfers.

I firmly believe that Congress must act to clear up the uncertainty if stability is to be achieved and sports fans and communities that have loyally supported their teams through good seasons and bad ones are to be protected against the arbitrary relocation of professional sports franchises.

The legislation I introduce today would give communities the first opportunity to match an offer before that franchise could be moved. If such an offer equalled the relocation offer, it would be unlawful for the franchise to move.

Second, the bill sets forth specific criteria to govern the relocation of professional sports franchises. Under the legislation, a team that has played its home games in a metropolitan area for 6 consecutive years or more could not relocate unless: First, one or more of the other parties to a stadium lease agreement fails to comply with the terms of the lease; second, the stadium is inadequate and the community refuses to remedy the inadequacies; or third, the team loses money for 3 consecutive years or has incurred losses for a shorter period that endangers the continued financial viability of the franchise.

And third, the bill provides for oversight hearings by the Committee on Energy and Commerce for at least 3 years on the effects of the legislation. While my bill does not specifically require the professional baseball, basketball, football, and hockey leagues to expand, it directs the committee to consider the desirability of establishing a national policy regarding expansion as part of the annual oversight hearings.

During the 98th Congress, the Committee on Energy and Commerce held hearings on legislation similar to the measure I am introducing today, to grant communities the right of first refusal and to set objective criteria that would have to be met before a team could relocate.

Municipalities make large investments in their professional sports teams in terms of providing facilities, favorable tax treatment, and encouraging community support. In effect, a partnership exists among the city, the fans, the players and the owners that should be respected and fostered by everyone. Owners of professional sports franchises should not be allowed to quietly slip their team out of town under cover of darkness without league approval and without meeting criteria such as set forth in this bill.

Professional sports franchises are invested with a strong public interest. Therefore, it should be national policy to discourage the relocation of teams that receive support from loyal fans.

The legislation I propose today will help us achieve that goal.●

KIM DAE JUNG'S HEROIC RETURN

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, the American people are gradually being introduced to Kim Dae Jung, the exiled Korean leader who will shortly rejoin the democratic movement in his homeland. Several articles have appeared in the press lately regarding his imminent return, including an article in the New York Times magazine of December 23, 1984. Most recently, Mary McGrory wrote a column in the Washington Post of January 3, 1985, which compares Mr. Kim to Bishop Tutu of South Africa and the late Benigno Aquino of the Phillipines. I ask that her excellent piece be reprinted here.

The article follows:

OF DEMOCRACY AND SAFETY

(By Mary McGrory)

On the face of it, Kim Dae Jung's announced plan to return to South Korea, where advocates of democracy like himself are regarded as traitors, seems suicidal folly.

One has only to think of the shower of bullets that met Benigno Aquino, the Philippine foe of the Marcos government, when he stepped off a plane in Manila in August 1983 to realize what a chance Kim is taking with the iron-fisted dictator who runs his native land.

But Kim is going home, probably in early February, although certainly not on a Korean Air Lines plane. He speaks confidently, in halting English, about his hope of having a dialogue with President Chun Doo Hwan, the general who seized power in May 1980 and who had Kim sentenced to death a short time later.

Kim, 58, who walks with a cane because of infirmities incurred during 5½ years of prison, has escaped death at the hands of Korean authorities on five occasions.

One rescue he attributes to divine intervention. He was kidnaped by the KCIA in Tokyo, then taken to sea. At the moment Kim's abductors were about to throw him overboard, a U.S. plane buzzed the boat and frightened off his captors.

He has also been saved by two American presidents. In 1978, he was released from prison—his crime was organizing and signing a Declaration for National Democracy—as a condition for a planned visit by President Jimmy Carter to South Korea. In 1981, President Reagan got Kim's death sentence commuted, and he finally wangled Kim's release from prison in 1982. Kim then came here for medical treatment, attended Harvard and tried, in vain, to change U.S. policy toward Korea.

Despite the fact that he is living proof that "quiet diplomacy" works, Kim says it is not enough.

"If the U.S. is for human rights and democracy," he said during an interview, "you must let my people know. You have to open diplomacy, too."

That point was recently brought home strongly by Bishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa, who came through here and reproached Reagan for his policy of "constructive engagement" with the South African government. He created such a stir that Reagan broke a four-year silence about the evils of apartheid.

The bishop's trump was his Nobel Peace Prize, which focused world attention on the agony of his homeland and reinforced his considerable moral authority.

Kim has a trump card, too, as he goes to confront a leader who seems to be holding the whole deck—the 600,000-man South Korean Army, the KCIA and the backing of the Reagan administration, which has praised the Korean government for small steps in liberalizing a rule that forbids political parties and freedom of the press.

Unlikely as it seems that the general would stoop to parley with a poor convict, Kim thinks that it will happen. Although Korea, with the exception of the campuses, is moderately calm and extremely prosperous, Kim says that riot police are ever on the watch in Seoul and that the smell of tear gas is often in the air.

That will not do during the Olympics, which are scheduled for Seoul in 1988. Kim contends that the majority of the Korean people want democracy—he came within four points of winning the presidency in 1970—and will not rest until they achieve it. Any kind of demonstrations, with the savage countermeasures the Korean police never hesitate to take, would make the rest of the world nervous for its athletes.

Kim is hoping to fly home with a large foreign delegation aboard to witness his arrival and the treatment accorded to him, assuming he survives the landing. Patt Derian, who vigorously served the Carter administration as assistant secretary of state for human rights, has agreed to go. Other notables, such as Mike Farrell, the "M*A*S*H" star, have expressed interest.

The Korean ambassador here has indicated the fury of his government at the prospect of Kim's homecoming. After Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) wrote Chun, asking him to ensure Kim's safety and to grant him amnesty, the ambassador told Kennedy that Kim would be expected to serve the 17½ years remaining on his 1980 sentence—even though his co-defendants have been unconditionally released.

Kim says he does not expect to land back in a dank Korean jail. He thinks imprisonment could prompt "a serious uprising" in Korea and a "grave international problem."

House arrest he is prepared for. It would keep him under wraps, but Koreans would receive the "powerful emotional message of my return."

Kim is going, probably in the first week of February. He thinks he belongs in Korea, with his people. And with the world looking on, fretting over the well-being of its treasured athletes, he thinks he may safely resume his dangerous work of trying to make it a more democratic society.●

ALZHEIMER'S DISEASE: THE NEED FOR A FEDERAL RESPONSE

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a bill aimed at combating what some have termed "the disease of the century," Alzheimer's disease. You know, I am sure, that Alzheimer's disease cuts its victims' life expectancies in half, devastates their families financially and emotionally, and accounts for more than half the admissions to nursing homes in this country. It afflicts between 1.2 and 4 million Americans and is the fourth leading cause of death. It is our Nation's most prominent long-term debilitating disease and it will not go away by itself. Instead, as our elderly population swells, it becomes a more powerful and pervasive problem to be reckoned with. This legislation would designate 20 regional centers for the treatment of Alzheimer's disease.

Alzheimer's is a progressive, degenerative brain disease, taking 3 to 20 years to run its relentless course. The cost of caring for an Alzheimer's victim is high. It is estimated at $17,000 to $50,000 per victim per year, most of which is borne by family members. There is an urgent need to establish a system that would effectively deal with Alzheimer's disease and related disorders.

Public and private resources available to assist individuals and families of those afflicted with other diseases are not available to Alzheimer's patients and their families. Federal coverage under Medicare and veterans' health programs is also minimal. Private assistance through supplemental and other health insurance policies is almost non-existent. The only public program to provide significant assistance, paying $6.5 billion a year for the nursing home care of Alzheimer's patients, is Medicaid. But even that assistance is conditioned on the impoverishment of the family and the availability of nursing home beds.

I have long been concerned about the Medicare Program and, in particular, with the number of essential health services that are not provided by that program. The largest single gap in the Medicare system is the absence of long-term care policy and delivery system.

I wonder how long the American people are going to tolerate the almost disgraceful system, or lack of system, that we have in America that does not provide some kind of a medical program under which every American can get the kind of medical care that he or she requires within his or her means. This has always struck me as a strange and lamentable gap in a country with one of the highest standards of living in the world. The bill I introduce today is intended as a first step toward closing that gap.

The 20 Alzheimer's treatment centers I have proposed will be responsible for providing a central facility for the diagnosis, evaluation, and counseling of patients and families of those afflicted with the disease. They will also develop standards of care, provide training for professionals and nonprofessionals in the diagnosis and treatment of this disease, and develop cost-effective methods for treatment of patients with Alzheimer's.

It is my intent that these centers provide comprehensive treatment for Alzheimer's patients, embracing both acute and long-term care, and supported by a per capita payment to the center based on the combination of benefits to which they would otherwise be entitled under Medicare, Medicaid and the Older Americans Act, and supplemented by a $1 million appropriation for each center to support the teaching and training of staff, and research.

There is a very real need for this legislation in order for us to address the enormous problem of this most savage and pitiful of diseases, Alzheimer's. It is past time we began to devote serious attention to the development of a long-term care system for this country. This bill, if enacted, would go a long way toward the development of long-term care policy and delivery system for the ever growing number of Alzheimer's victims in this country. I welcome cosponsors from among my colleagues in the Congress.●

FUSION ENERGY: OUR BEST OPTION MAY LIE IN INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, in October 1984, the National Research Council's Report on Cooperation and Competition on the Path to Fusion Energy outlined our country's options on fusion energy research and development.

Today, I am introducing a joint resolution urging the adoption of the Council's recommendations, calling for formation of a national policy and renewal of national attention on the future of fusion energy research and development and the possibilities of increased international cooperation in such efforts. I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort, to keep the pursuit of fusion technology on track and in motion.

I have long been interested in this subject and have worked actively over the years to see that we maintain our budgetary and policy commitments to the pursuit of a successful nuclear fusion facility. Fusion has long been hailed as a long-term source of energy and our country's laboratories have been at the forefront of fusion research—most notably at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and the Princeton University Plasma Physics Laboratory.

We are in danger of losing our position as a world leader in fusion technology. We have become complacent about our Nation's energy situation, even though supply instabilities are still a major threat. Fusion, although its commercial applications require more years of study and development, promises to advance the field of physics and pave the way for a new, untapped energy source.

We cannot afford to abandon or to even curtail research in this area. We can take full advantage of past technology, present budget situations, and future potential if we pursue an aggressive, balanced, and farsighted program of international cooperation. The committee found, in fact, that a program including increased international collaboration is preferable to a predominantly domestic program, which would have to command substantial additional resources for the competitive pursuit of fusion energy development or run the risk of forfeiture of equality with other world programs.

The Committee on International Cooperation in Magnetic Fusion is made up of company CEO's, scientists—both public and private, and academics—all of whom have been active in the area of fusion energy research for many years. The committee has issued a set of recommendations designed to continue the momentum of our country's research, while recognizing the limits of budgets and time.

The report's major conclusions are: One, that on balance, there are substantial potential benefits of large-scale international collaboration in the development of fusion energy. Two, a window in time for large-scale international collaboration is now open. Three, large-scale international collaboration can be achieved, but not quickly. Four, international collaboration will require stable international commitments. Five, there is a host of considerations that must be resolved in the implementation, but these appear workable. And six, past cooperation provides a sound basis for future efforts.

The potential benefits that exist were the United States to undertake serious international cooperative efforts, according to the committee, are technical results, either reached sooner or more fully; economic returns, which could expand scale and scope or research; reduction of cumulative costs through sharing; political aims, to satisfy past international summit meetings objective of closer international collaboration; an increase in our own country's program strength by our already strong position in long-term experiments; and improvement in our prestige as a leader in the area of fusion; and the critical maintenance of national security, which, according to the committee, would not be threatened at all.

We have invested great amounts of time, energy and funding in fusion technology. Unlike our present-day nuclear reactors which generate power through fission energy—the splitting apart of atoms—fusion energy combines atoms. The great attraction to fusion energy is that many of its fuel components are readily available in seawater, and the problems of waste disposal are thought to be significantly less than those of today's nuclear fission reactors. Two major programs in the United States, at Livermore and at Princeton, have advanced fusion research in two major fusion technologies, tandem mirrors and tokomaks.

I hope my colleagues will join in addressing this energy issue in the 99th Congress and working toward a comprehensive set of goals, budgets, and policies in this area.●

THE OLDER VETERANS' HEALTH CARE AMENDMENTS OF 1985

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to improve the delivery of health care by the Veterans' Administration to older veterans. This legislation is designed to assure the equitable and efficient provision of health care services, particularly extended care services, to older veterans.

Last year, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs presented a report to the Nation on the anticipated increase in demand for health care which an aging veteran population is expected to place on the VA health care system. Since that time, there have been a number of reports in the press that, rather than finding ways of meeting the demand, the administration is considering methods of denying veterans the health care which is now available to them. I think it is very callous for the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to threaten veterans with the loss of health care eligibility.

Make no mistake about it—the vast majority of veterans who are using the VA health care system are either disabled as a result of their military service or are unable to pay for medical care. The country owes these men and women a debt for their service to this country, and we in the Congress intend to ensure that this debt is honored.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I am including a brief analysis of the provisions of the Older Veterans' Health Care Amendments of 1985. This bill does not create a new health care system, nor does it make major changes in eligibility for such health care. It is intended to make existing provisions consistent with the treatment modalities most commonly used for older veterans. Put another way, this legislation will free the doctors and other health care professionals who treat older veterans from archaic and anomalous restrictions on their ability to prescribe the most efficient and appropriate course of treatment for such veterans, and provide health care at less cost.

I believe that we as a nation must continue to honor our commitment to veterans, while at the same time searching for ways to match limited resources with essential health care needs of veterans. If we fail to do so, the cherished trust which the citizen-soldiers of our Nation have placed in us will be lost forever.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE OLDER VETERANS HEALTH CARE AMENDMENTS OF 1985

Section 1 of the bill is the short title of the bill.

Section 2 of the bill would authorize the Veterans' Administration to provide respite care to veterans suffering from terminal illnesses. Respite care is a relatively new concept in the United States that incorporates the advantages of providing care for individuals in their home with the necessary care which is available at VA hospitals and nursing home care units. While the VA has attempted to provide respite care on an experimental basis, existing provisions governing the provision of health care do not clearly address the circumstances in which respite care is provided. This provision is intended to clarify the VA's authority to provide such care when medically indicated. It is believed that the net result of this provision will be to free up more acute and intermediate care beds that are now occupied by terminally ill patients who could be cared for in their homes if respite care is available.

Section 3 of the bill would amend existing provisions governing the admission of veterans to VA domiciliaries. The existing provision governing admission of veterans with service-connected disabilities to domiciliaries is inconsistent with the priority afforded to such veterans in other parts of the VA health care system. This amendment will eliminate disparate treatment afforded to such veterans.

Section 4 would amend provisions governing the provision of outpatient services in order to encourage medically indicated discharges from VA nursing home care units and domiciliaries. At present, certain veterans are maintained as patients in nursing homes and domiciliaries operated by the VA because they require follow-up medical treatment for various diseases. These veterans are not discharged in some cases because they would not receive the necessary follow-up care. By making such veterans eligible for follow-up medical care from the VA on an outpatient basis, this provision will enable the VA to treat more veterans in nursing home care units and domiciliaries without adding beds to the VA system.

Section 5 would permit transfers from VA nursing home care units and domiciliaries to community nursing homes. At present, a veteran must be discharged from VA hospital care in order to be transferred to a community nursing home at VA expense. This encourages unnecessary hospital admissions because a doctor who believes that a patient should be cared for in a community nursing home can only arrange such treatment by first admitting the patient to a costly hospital bed for a period of time prior to transfer to the community nursing home. A similar practice of admitting patients to a VA hospital who are being treated at home through the VA's hospital-based home care program in order to make them eligible for community nursing home treatment would also be eliminated by clause (2) of this section. Section 5 would also permit veterans who require nursing home care for treatment of a service connected disability to be provided with such care without the administrative burden of extending the authorization for such care every six months. Finally, this section would also authorize the Veterans Administration to make per diem payments to states providing intermediate nursing care to veterans being cared for in state nursing homes. Payment for intermediate care at the existing nursing home rate is appropriate in light of the services being provided by state veterans homes.

Section 6 would authorize an expansion of the VA's successful program of encouraging clinical treatment of, and research into, diseases affecting older veterans. This program, known as the geriatric research, education, and clinical center (GRECC) program, was formally established by the Congress in Public Law 96-330. At present, there are ten such programs operating successfully throughout the nation. This program is a fine example of how the government can examine the needs of veterans today in order to provide better treatment for veterans in the future. This section encourages the VA to continue to expand this program by authorizing 25 such programs, instead of the present authorization level of 15.

Section 7 provides that the authorities contained in this measure would not be effective until October 1, 1985.

H.R. —

A CONGRESSIONAL TRIBUTE TO TIM COFFMAN, HONORARY MAYOR OF WILMINGTON—1984

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity today to pay tribute to one of Wilmington's most valued citizens, Mr. Tim Coffman, who has served as the honorary mayor of the city for the 1983-84 term. Tim, 39, follows the winning tradition of the Wilmington Rotary Club, having won the office by raising $4,090 during his campaign.

I must explain, Mr. Speaker, that Wilmington is a part of the city of Los Angeles, and thus does not have a mayor per se. Both Wilmington and the adjoining community of San Pedro each year elect honorary mayors, the winner being determined by the amount of money the candidates raise for charitable organizations.

Mr. Coffman serves the community not only through his efforts with the Rotary organization, but with the Wilmington Optimists as well. He came to Wilmington in 1979 when the new Maritime Bank of California opened, and currently works with the Golden State Sanwa Bank in Culver City.

As honorary mayor, Tim has participated in the 1983 Christmas Afloat Parade, the Wilmington Chamber of Commerce Harbor Holidays Banquet, and the 1984 Miss Port of Los Angeles Pageant. He was also a member of the Wilmington Chamber of Commerce during the 1984 term.

Although others in the community may have lived there longer, few can match Tim Coffman's contributions. He is an example of the fine citizenship and community spirit that prevails in the 32d district, and makes it an honor for me to represent it in this distinguished institution.

My wife, Lee, joins me in saluting Tim Coffman, for his selfless dedication to the Wilmington community. We wish Tim, his wife Sandy, and their children, Jennifer and Kimberly, all the best in the years to come.●

IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1985

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, 1985, the first day of the 99th Congress, I introduced H.R. 30, the Immigration Act of 1985. That bill is comprehensive and a fair and workable immigration reform bill. At this time I would like to include in the RECORD a brief summary of its main provisions.

(The summary follows:)

SUMMARY OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1985

TITLE I—PREVENTING UNFAIR COMPETITION AND DISPLACEMENT OF DOMESTIC WORKERS FROM EMPLOYMENT OF UNAUTHORIZED ALIENS

Unfair Immigration-Related Employment Practices

PENALIZE EMPLOYERS FOR NEWLY ESTABLISHED UNFAIR IMMIGRATION-RELATED EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES—AS A NEW VERSION OF EMPLOYER SANCTIONS WITHOUT EMPLOYER VERIFICATION OR PAPERWORK REQUIREMENTS

State purposes:

To avoid unfair competition in the labor market among employers and employees

To curtail displacement of legal U.S. residents by undocumented workers

To prevent any discrimination resulting from employer sanctions

Prohibit "unfair immigration-related employment practices" of:

Knowingly hiring, recruiting, referring, or retaining unauthorized aliens (effective six months after enactment)

Discriminating against citizens and residents authorized to work (with exemptions including employers of 3 or fewer and offenses covered by Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act)

Foreclose the establishment of a national I.D. card or system to implement employer sanctions

Establish an administrative enforcement scheme through an independent Special Counsel, administrative law judge and Immigration Board system within the Department of Justice, based on the Hawkins amendment. This system would provide for:

Private rights of action that would be initiated by an individual or class (or representative organization such as a union) that was "adversely affected" by either form of unfair employment practice (either by displacement by an undocumented worker, or by discrimination based on citizenship/immigration status). Should the Special Counsel find no reasonable cause for an individual's charge, the individual may seek a summary redetermination before the U.S. Immigration Board

In pattern or practice cases, actions initiated by the Special Counsel's independent investigation or by an INS officer's charge

Establish parallel penalty structures for either form of unfair immigration-related employment practice:

For every violation, a mandatory graduated civil fine (from $1,000 to $3,000), which must take into account the size of the business and the gravity of the offense

For cases brought as private rights of action, the hiring of aggrieved workers, with or without backpay, or reasonable compensation for lost wages

For pattern or practice cases (not mere isolated or accidental violations), a cease-and-desist order, and, optionally, other appropriate relief, such as required nondiscriminatory screening of job applicants, paperwork for new hires, and those remedies available to aggrieved individuals

Coordination of Enforcement of Existing Labor Laws

Require plan for focused enforcement of existing wage and hour and other labor laws (for example, the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Occupational Safety and Health Act) to deter the employment anid exploitation of unauthorized aliens

Require report on effectiveness of enforcement of existing Internal Revenue Service and Social Security Administration requirements for withholding and payment of employment-related taxes for unauthorized alien workers

Transitional Agricultural Employer Exemption

Establish a three-year transitional agricultural worker program, permitting growers to continue to use first 100%, then 67%, then 33%, then 0% of their current illegal alien labor force

TITLE II—IMPROVEMENT OF ENFORCEMENT AND SERVICES OF THE IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE

Enhanced INS Enforcement and Service Functions

Increased authorizations for INS to both strengthen enforcement and improve services, with "special emphasis" language on improved services, enhanced community outreach and in-service training of personnel, and increased recordkeeping and retrieval capability

FY85—$80 million supplemental (total for FY 85 of $659 million)

FY86—$710 million

FY87—$725 million

Require report by Attorney General and Secretary of State on negotiations with Mexico and Canada to establish alien antismuggling programs

Adjudication/Naturalization

Establish independent U.S. Immigration Board and administrative law judge system within Department of Justice

Permit alternative administrative naturalization procedure in addition to current judicial one

TITLE III—REFORM OF LEGAL IMMIGRATION

Immigrants

Provide additional 20,000 visas annually for contiguous countries, allowing each to use those unused by the other

Increase colonial quota from 600 to 3,000 visas (affects Hong Kong)

Nonimmigrants

Establish 3-year pilot program for waiver of visa requirement for certain foreign visitors

TITLE IV—LEGALIZATION

Establish legalization procedures to permit certain aliens who arrived in the U.S. before January 1, 1982, to apply for adjustment to legal status

Adopt a legalization program, similar to the conference version, that permits eligible aliens to apply for immediate adjustment to permanent resident status if they can show:

Continuous residence in the U.S. in unlawful status since January 1, 1982 (documentation requirements are liberal, and allow the use of affidavits)

Admissibility as an immigrant, with specified exceptions and waivers

The public charge exclusion may be waived and will not apply where the alien shows a history of employment without substantial reliance on public cash assistance

Basic citizenship skills:

An elementary English-speaking and comprehension ability

A basic comprehension of American government (which may be tested, at the option of the applicant, in one's native language, and orally or in writing)

Permit adjustment to temporary resident status for up to 2 years for those who elect to pursue this option, or who meet the criteria for permanent resident status except for the public charge exclusion or the citizenship skills requirement

Provide procedural safeguards for applicants, such as:

Protections from deportation and authorization to work.

Judicial review of denials.

Guarantees of confidentiality of application information.

Separate Cuban-Haitian adjustment program.

Update registry date to January 1, 1978 (routine regularization of status).

State/Local Assistance

Establish 5-year period of ineligibility for federal benefits (with exceptions for critical services, such as basic medical, nutritional and educational assistance, as provided for in conference).

Provide for full reimbursement to states, subject to appropriations, allowing for carryover into subsequent years, but with a 4-year authorization ceiling of $2.7 billion.

TITLE V—INTERNATIONAL MIGRATION

Provide for the appointment of a Presidential Representative for International Migration responsible for:

Development of overall U.S. policy related to international migration;

Representation and negotiation with other governments on unauthorized immigration (under the direction of Secretary of State);

Convening of an international conference on migration issues.

Authorize the President to convene an International Conference on Migration to develop (a) regional collaborative mechanisms to address problems of unauthorized immigration; and (b) mutually beneficial agreements related to economic development to alleviate unauthorized immigration.

TITLE VI—REPORTS

Require GAO report on effects of Title I efforts to control illegal immigration.

Require Presidential reports on push-pull factors affecting unauthorized immigration and on admissions and effects of immigration.

Establish Commission on current H-2 program, to set standards for labor certification, recruitment of U.S. workers, and the size of any temporary worker program.●

VIOLENT ATTACKS ON ABORTION CLINICS

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to raise questions on the growing number of bombings on abortion clinics and related facilities around the country. Over the past few months we have witnessed a dramatic increase in the number and violence of these attacks; yet the FBI has been only marginally involved. Although there is a definite pattern reflected throughout these incidents, the FBI has been reluctant to place these violent acts among their top priorities. Instead the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms has been the lead agency involved in the investigation. To date only 12 of the 30 incidents being investigated since May 1982 have led to arrests.

The bombings of the abortion clinics are illegal acts which should be investigated by the highest level of law enforcement in this country and these domestic terrorists should be brought to immediate justice. They strike at the core of all that this country stands for: freedom. With these acts the anti-abortion fanatics are trying to impose their will by the use of violence and terror.

These attacks must be stopped now. If we are to survive as a nation we must abide by the laws of our society and respect the well-being and property of others. I have written a letter to Director William H. Webster urging the FBI to take a leadership role in the investigation of these violent attacks, the text of the letter follows:

JANUARY 7, 1985.

Mr. WILLIAM H. WEBSTER,
Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. WEBSTER: I am writing to urge that the Federal Bureau of Investigation become actively involved in the investigation of the violent attacks and bombings of abortion-related institutions. As you are well aware, the number and violence of these attacks has increased dramatically over the past few months.

Regardless of how one feels about the complex issue of abortion, the need to fairly and uniformly enforce the law against such domestic terrorism is and should be paramount. Unfortunately, the caution of the FBI in involving itself in this problem has led to speculation about the seriousness of this Administration in opposing such illegalities.

The nationwide pattern of these attacks has created a situation which requires the unique expertise and talents of the FBI.

Again, I urge you to place these attacks on the top of your priorities so that they may be stopped once and for all. Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely yours,

NORMAN Y. MINETA,
Member of Congress.●

I'M CLEANING IT UP FOR YOU

HON. E. CLAY SHAW, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I draw attention to an outstanding citizen from my district, Bill Lindsey. Mr. Lindsey was recently chosen as a runner-up in the Time magazine's search for the 1984 man of the year. As a resident of Fort Lauderdale, Mr. Lindsey was recognized for his preeminent work in bringing new life to parts of our city that others thought were hopeless.

Bill's imaginative and creative approach to seemingly impossible problems and attitude of rolling up his sleeves and getting the job done helped him successfully turn a slum into a working model for others to follow. He has provided America with an excellent example of outstanding community service. I would like to share with my colleagues the article in which Time honors one of our outstanding Americans, Bill Lindsey.

I'M CLEANING IT UP FOR YOU

The problem: one of those hopeless disaster areas known as a ghetto, an inner city, a slum. This particular one, on the northwest side of Fort Lauderdale, bore the cheerful name of Citrus Park, but it was a sullen collection of two dozen four-family stucco houses, dilapidated, garbage-strewn, crime-ridden.

Raised as an Army brat, the son of a major, Bill Lindsey was 25 and wore a beard and ponytail when he first came to Citrus Park twelve years ago. The civil rights movement had convinced him that, "you know, you're supposed to be doing something." So he had joined VISTA, the domestic Peace Corps, which assigned him to Fort Lauderdale, just to "observe." A passing policeman questioned him about why he was living in a tough black neighborhood and added a warning that he would "be dead in three days."

Lindsey joined a group of four tenants trying to organize a rent strike, using their rent money to make repairs. One of the first steps was to install security fences and better lighting. Such measures irritated the thieves and drug peddlers who ruled the streets. They tore down the fences. Lindsey and some neighbors put the fences up again, then stood guard. One thug attacked Lindsey with a knife, slashed through his windbreaker and cut his stomach. Lindsey whipped out a .38 and shoved it under the knifer's nose. "I told him to get on his knees and beg," says Lindsey. "I could have killed that guy."

The rent strike, which Lindsey by now headed, began working. When the strikers cited 200 building-code violations in one block, the city authorities did nothing, so the strikers got the state to bring the landlord to heel. To get more trash collections, the strikers trucked the garbage downtown and left it to rot in the sun. Says Lindsey: "People were taking things into their own hands, and that generated a lot of excitement."

Within a year, Citrus Park underwent some remarkable changes. Houses were painted and repaired, gardens were planted, crime rates fell, garbage was collected. So Lindsey went downtown in his blue jeans and ponytail and applied for the vacant job of city housing-authority director. The housing commissioners at first "freaked out," he says, then listened to his ideas and astonishingly gave hm the job.

One of Lindsey's notions was to concentrate on what he called oasis areas. Another was to spend about half his time working with repair crews in the streets of such areas, even in private yards. "I wanted the people in the projects to see the man in charge," he says. "When people asked what I was doing, I'd say, 'The first time, I'm cleaning it up for you. The second time, I'll be cleaning it up for the new tenant.'" Lindsey had remarkable authority not only to evict tenants while he renovated buildings in oasis areas but also to permit only "good people" to move in. "A good person to us was someone who made some contribution to where he was living, someone who would respect the rights of his neighbors," says Lindsey. "The bad people are the people who don't do those things."

It worked, both because Lindsey had won a lot of neighborhood support and because he used a variety of methods to make each oasis grow. He started a tutoring program, for example, that now teaches 150 youngsters reading and arithmetic, plus a variety of "coping skills." He started a plant nursery in what was once a junkyard, where tenants can pick out trees for their yards. With the help of Ronald Range, a black detective from Boston, he organized "X-ray units;" small tactical police squads that worked closely with community leaders to protect each oasis.

Having doubled the amount of housing for the poor and reduced crime rates to the same levels as those of rich white districts, Lindsey now presides more or less benignly over some 2,000 housing units. Washington is putting up $200,000 to try his oasis system in another city, possibly Houston. But to Lindsey, who now has a $52,000 salary and no beard or ponytail, the big danger is that Government still tends to favor what he calls a failure model, imposing expensive programs on the poor and then blaming them for the predictable problems. "Public housing must be a privilege," Lindsey sums up. "You don't get in just because you're poor. You get in because you're poor and willing to accept responsibility."●

JOSEPH MENNELLA

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take this opportunity to pay tribute to a man who was honored last November in Newark, NJ. Mr. Joseph Mennella is the new national commander of the Italian American War Veterans of the U.S. Inc.

Mr. Mennella is the first Vietnam veteran to hold this post. I believe that this is significant as an important step in our Nation's long overdue recognition of the contributions of the Vietnam veterans.

I am proud to take a few moments today to place into the RECORD the following biography of Joseph Mennella. I know my colleagues will join me in saluting him on this very important honor.

The biography of Joseph Mennella follows:

JOSEPH MENNELLA

National Commander Joseph Mennella, the son of Anthony and Donatella Mennella, was born in Newark, New Jersey. One of four sons, the Commander possesses a Masters degree with a thesis accorded a Library of Congress number.

Commander Mennella, the Italian American War Veterans of the U.S. Incorporated's first Vietnam veteran in its 52 year history, has been active in veterans affairs since returning to college after discharge from the U.S. Army. Several years ago he was instrumental in organizing the New Jersey Association of Veterans Program Administrators, a professional state-wide organization. Twice re-elected to the Association's presidency, he also remains a charter member of the national organization's Board of Directors.

An alumnus of Alpha Sigma Mu, the national veterans fraternity, Commander Mennella has received appointments to a state council and a Newark board, respectively, by the Governor and Mayor of Newark. These positions were held simultaneously to the National Commander's New Jersey and national endeavors. Last year, as the national organization's Senior Vice Commander, the Commander was directly responsible for organizing three new veteran's posts, one in New Jersey and two in Florida, as well as reorganizing a post in Florida.

Both an Italian American activist and Vietnam veteran activist, Commander Mennella is the third person to bring this honored title to New Jersey. The last National Commander honored from the State of New Jersey was almost twenty years ago.

Currently, National Commander Mennella is also the organization's first delegate to the National Italian American Coordinating Association, a national umbrella organization of Italian American organizations.

THE NEED FOR A CONGRESSIONALLY MANDATED BIPARTISAN COMMISSION ON MEDICARE

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all aware that Medicare, within about 4 years, will be in the condition that Social Security was in before the National Commission on Social Security Reform recommended action with respect to that program. Therefore, I am introducing, following the precedent of what was done with respect to Social Security, a bill to establish a bipartisan Commission to deal with the problem of Medicare.

In 1965, with the enactment of Medicare and Medicaid, Congress established a sacred covenant with the American people—access to quality health care shall not be limited by wealth or age.

Though there is little doubt the poor and elderly have greatly benefited from these essential programs, expenditures have now reached the level that some suggest we must break that covenant and shift the burden of caring. Total health care expenditures in this country have increased by 750 percent since Medicare was enacted. Per capita expenditures have increased from $211 in 1965 to $1,459 in 1983. The Government's share of health care costs has climbed from 26 to 42 percent, with total health outlays under Medicare and Medicaid exceeding $80 billion in 1983.

As a result of these increasing costs, the Congressional Budget Office estimates the Medicare trust fund will be depleted by 1987 or 1988 if the law remains unchanged. Current projections are that there will be a $7.6 billion deficit in 1987 unless the program is fundamentally restructured.

Obviously there is a critical need to stop the erosion in Medicare. At the same time, we need to ensure the solvency of the system. The administration has proposed several measures, but they place undue financial strain on beneficiaries and result in only short-term savings for Medicare.

There are other problems. We know that Medicare covers less than one half of the total health care expenditures of the elderly. Senior citizens are paying more and more out of pocket to participate in Medicare and Medicare is covering less and less of their health care bill. In 1965, the year Medicare was enacted, senior citizens spent 20 percent of their per capita income on health care. Today, they pay just as high a share. More than half of the physicians participating in Medicare do not accept assignment and, accordingly, Medicare's share of physicians' fees is decreasing.

Clearly, action must be taken. It is for this reason that I am calling for a congressionally-mandated bipartisan Commission on Medicare. The Commission's mandate is twofold: First, to make recommendations to resolve the short- and long-term financial problems facing Medicare; and second, to provide for adequate and cost-effective benefits. The Commission would begin its work October 1, 1985 and cease to exist on June 1, 1986 upon submission of its report with recommendations to the President and the Congress. The Commission will be composed of 18 members, as follows: 6 Members of Congress appointed by the Speaker of the House—3 Democrats and 3 Republicans; 6 Members of the Senate appointed by the President pro tempore—3 Democrats and 3 Republicans; and 6 Members appointed by the President—3 Democrats and 3 Republicans.

Medicare is at a crossroads. It is up to the Congress, Republicans and Democrats working together, to set in motion this plan to preserve and strengthen this invaluable program.●

INTRODUCING A BILL TO RESTRICT THE LISTENING-IN OR RECORDING OF TELEPHONE CONVERSATIONS

HON. JACK BROOKS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Federal Telecommunications Privacy Act of 1985. This bill, which is identical to legislation passed by the Government Operations Committee last year, will severely limit the practice of listening-in or recording of telephone conversations within the Federal Government. Generally, it prohibits such practices by Federal officials without the consent of all parties. Exceptions to this prohibition are provided, however, for legitimate purposes such as law enforcement and counterintelligence.

The policies and procedures established by this legislation are similar to the requirements of existing Federal regulations which have been issued by the General Services Administration, but largely ignored by Federal agencies. Unlike those regulations, however, this bill contains enforcement provisions to ensure that Federal officials do not resort to the abusive practice of secretly recording private conversations.

The use of secret recordings is pervasive within the Federal Government. Subsequent to the passage by the committee on last year's bill, many agencies came out of the woodwork and disclosed that they were conducting these activities. I am even more firmly convinced that Congress must establish strong controls and guidelines in this area to prevent future abuses.

It is unfortunate that this legislation is needed. Most Federal employees conduct Government business in a professional and ethical manner. However, there are always a few who will ignore any rule that does not carry with it a strict penalty. This bill should get their attention.●

CORPS OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, throughout this land, Americans are served daily by an unsung but dedicated corps of public servants at the local level of government. It is this hard-working group of public officials who are closest to the people, and probably most responsive to their daily concerns.

Floyd A. Cairns, one of the best of this corps of public servants, retired at the end of 1984, from his position as clerk of the city of Farmington Hills, MI, after 29 years in that position. He takes with him a storehouse of information, experience, and skill that served the people well over these years, and will be greatly missed. He also takes with him our deep appreciation and love for his dedicated service.

Floyd is a lifelong resident of the area, and over the years, he gained the well deserved reputation of being the one who knows all there is to know when it comes to Farmington Hills.

The vast extent of his knowledge speaks to the great love and concern he has held for the people and the area, and the feelings that were the basis of his devoted service to Farmington Hills.

During the 29 years that Floyd has served as clerk of Farmington Hills, he has seen the position and demands change and multiply as the nature of the community changed from a rural area to a suburban community. In this change, Floyd has always been able to respond to the new demands placed on him, and ease the community in its transition as he served on a never-ending list of civic and governmental boards and commissions.

Mr. Speaker, I know my colleagues in the House join me in extending our sincerest congratulations and very best wishes to Floyd and his lovely wife, Leola, as they begin their retirement years. May their future years continue to be rich and fulfilling.●

GERALD B. PAYNE, CHAMPION OF YOUTH

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of our colleagues the remarkable career of a man from my district of Pennsylvania who is being honored for his achievements in behalf of our youth.

I speak of Gerald B. Payne, a Scranton businessman, who is to receive the first Champion of Youth Award ever presented by the Boys Clubs of Scranton, and a national Medallion Award from the Boys Clubs of America in recognition of 28 years of service to that organization.

Mr. Payne, the founder and board chairman of Gilsonite Laboratories in Scranton, has spent many years working to make the Boys Clubs of Scranton successful in reaching out to help the youth of our community.

He was an active member of the Boys Clubs of Scranton board of directors from 1957 to 1980 and since 1981, has been an honorary board member.

During his many years of service to this youth guidance organization, he served on its personnel, camp and finance committees and was a member of its new building and property committees. For 5 years he was a member of its camp committee.

Additional evidence of his interest in the youth of our community is the fact that in 1968, he gathered together a group of businessmen and raised the money to establish a Junior Achievement Program in Scranton. The success of that program is evidenced by the dedication last year of the Gerald B. Payne Junior Achievement Center in Scranton, the program's permanent home.

In 1932, Mr. Payne founded United Gilsonite and began manufacturing furnace cement using equipment he had salvaged from a junkyard for $5. From this humble beginning he went on to build a business which today manufactures more than 70 quality products for the do-it-yourself market.

Today, United Gilsonite Laboratories is housed in a 5-acre manufacturing complex in Scranton which includes its corporate headquarters and distribution center for the Eastern United States.

Mr. Payne expresses the philosophy by which he lives this way:

> The real difference between men is energy. A strong will, a defined purpose and invincible determination can accomplish almost anything.

His success as a businessman and as a champion of youth bears testimony to the validity of this philosophy.●

THE INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO PERMIT VISTA VOLUNTEERS AGED 55 OR OLDER TO SERVE LONGER THAN 5 YEARS

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to introduce a bill to amend the VISTA legislation to permit VISTA volunteers aged 55 or older to serve as volunteers without regard to the current 5-year limitation on service.

Section 104(b) of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 stipulates that no VISTA volunteers may serve for more than 5 years under this part.

The Massachusetts Association of Older Americans has sponsored a VISTA volunteer program in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for many years. All of the VISTA volunteers in this program are from 60 to 89 years of age. Through extensive training they have been able to help hundreds of elderly and disabled to obtain assistance in the many entitlement and discretionary programs for senior citizens.

This program has not only helped the low and moderate income elderly, but has also provided an important role for the volunteers in the communities they serve. It is a new career for them, which provides supplementary income and an opportunity to continue useful service.

When the VISTA program was started, practically all of the VISTA volunteers were relatively young, and most of them attended college, or had just completed college. As far as I know, the Massachusetts Association of Older Americans' senior program is the only one in the country that provides an opportunity for older Americans to help older Americans.

Recently, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts passed a law abolishing mandatory retirement, so that persons can no longer be retired on the basis of age.

Based on the important services provided by the Massachusetts Association of Older American program, and on this growing trend to abolish mandatory retirement, except in certain restricted circumstances, I believe the Domestic Volunteer Service Act should be changed with an amendment that I am introducing to exclude VISTA volunteers 55 years of age and over from the current 5-years-of-service limitation.

The results of the performance of the senior VISTA volunteers in this program have provided an important role for the volunteers, and the expertise gained through their years of experience should not be eliminated.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

SAN GABRIEL SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA LODGE NO. 278 F. & A.M.

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, on December 3, 1984, the San Gabriel Southern California Lodge No. 278 F. & A.M. celebrated its 100th anniversary in the city of San Gabriel, CA.

With the 100th birthday of this fine and venerable organization, they have provided leaders of their communities, the State of California, and of the Federal Government for a period longer than the age of most of the cities in the area.

For 10 score years the members of the Masonic temple have donated their time, talents, and considerable resources to benefit the local community. Their effort have benefited countless individuals over this century of service.

For this 100 years the lodge has made many tangible and intangible contributions toward a stronger, better society by molding dynamic men of leadership within its ranks.

Mr. Speaker to help commemorate the 100th anniversary of a grand and patriotic group, I would like to proclaim before my colleagues in the House of Representatives, December 3, 1984, as the centennial of San Gabriel Southern California Lodge No. 278 F. & A.M., 100 years of Masonry in southern California.●

IN HONOR OF HYMAN HAVES

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 7, 1985

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today in honor of my friend Hyman H. Haves. Hy was recently selected as Ketubah B'nai B'rith's outstanding volunteer of 1983–84. Hy is an exceptional member of the Los Angeles community and was most deserving of this honor. I would like to share his outstanding record with my colleagues, and therefore request that the attached Los Angeles Times article and city of Los Angeles proclamation be reprinted.

[Los Angeles Times, Nov. 12, 1984]

THE OPINIONATED HY HAVES: A JEWISH ACTIVIST FOR ALL REASONS

(By Tia Gindick, Times Staff Writer)

Hy Haves studied his turkey sandwich, spread mustard on it, leaned his elbows intently on the table at the Sports Deli in Century City and began to talk.

He talked about his wife, Ethel, a recovering alcoholic, and how he raised hell in the Jewish community for failure of groups like Jewish Family Services to realize that alcoholism was a problem with Jews. "And because of me, something was done."

He reflected that if he had his life to live over again, he'd become a lawyer because "law allows you to get into politics, and there's a greater need to use the power of the law to convince people. . . . You can preach from now to doomsday, but it takes the power of the law to help the underprivileged and repressed."

DEBATED DIRECTOR

He told how he debated Jewish Defense League executive director Irv Rubin even though he essentially believes "people like that should be isolated and quarantined so that their ideas don't infect other people"; but once their ideas do get out "somebody had to refute them."

He talked about letters he'd written: to B'nai B'rith International president Gerald Kraft and its executive vice president Dan Thursz about the International Olympic Committee's "negative attitude" toward Israel; to Sen. Alan Cranston about being buried in a veterans cemetery, preferably Arlington or West Los Angeles, and has any thought been given to using the airspace at the West L.A. facility?; to local newspapers lamenting the lack of use of Temescal Canyon in Pacific Palisades.

LETTER WRITER

Call Hy Haves a man for all reasons. It's easy to peg him as an activist, but not so easy to slip him in a niche. His letters to newspapers, for example. He writes to his community weekly, the Palisadian Post, with the same vigor that he writes to The Times, and probably as frequently. It can be in response to something he just read, or on a subject, any issue—Hy Haves will give you an opinion. It doesn't bother him that his letters aren't always published. Realistically, he ackowledges, you can't run a Hy Haves letter every day.

It means absolutely nothing to Haves that his four children are grown; that he retired from his job as national finance director for the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith six years ago and has stepped down from the various leadership positions he's held in the Jewish community. Call it a proprietary interest that entitles him—indeed, obliges him, he claims—to speak out whenever he sees something that isn't being done quite the way he'd do it.

Haves at 68 can be annoying. By his own admission, his family, friends and co-workers chide him—"bemusedly, I think"—for always wanting to run things. But there's an admiration factor, too. B'nai B'rith International honored him at its biennial convention earlier this year as its outstanding volunteer for 1983-84. And on Saturday, the Ketubah B'nai B'rith Unit is celebrating that tribute and toasting Haves' wife, Ethel, at its Chai dinner-dance at the Century Plaza.

Hy and Ethel Haves both feel things with a passion. She is 66, an artist emblazoned with a strong sense of the power of creativity. But she also is a native Canadian who was blacklisted during the McCarthy Era, which is why, she says, her orientation always tends to be political. Those difficult years in the 1950s were when she started drinking heavily, she says, and for years she was "a kitchen drinker," through her first marriage and her husband's death in 1965 and into the first few years of marriage to Haves, who also had been widowed.

DISCONCERTINGLY CANDID

Ethel Haves is disconcertingly candid about being an alcoholic, what it did to her and what it took to reach that point 15 years ago last month when she decided it was time to do something and she stopped. Since then, she has spoken in public on the subject and done private counseling.

Haves has committed his life, both personally and professionally, to Judaism. He has been involved with B'nai B'rith since he was 16 and eligible to join its Aleph Zadik Aleph (AZA), the boys' component of the B'nai B'rith Youth Organization (BBYO).

(At age 12, growing up in New Haven, Conn., where his father was a capmaker and his mother a homemaker, he started his own Macabees Club after determining the other Jewish youth group in town was too Zionist.)

AZA so enthralled him, he says, that he hitchhiked to its national conventions (the 1936 meeting was held at the Presbyterian Conference Grounds in Temescal Canyon, his first exposure to that site), was elected AZA national president and was eventually appointed AZA's first New York director.

During World War II, he served as a combat navigator in the 380th Bomb Group, 5th Air Force. Through a curious chain of circumstances prompted by the fact that "I always made it a habit to speak with the rabbi in the area," the Jewish Chaplaincy Corps designated him the Jewish chaplain for the Northern Territory in Australia and the Island of Mindora in the Philippines, which in turn got him an invitation from the Jewish community of Sydney, Australia, to assist them in creating a liberal congregation and Jewish Center.

RETURNED TO NEW YORK

After the war, he returned to New York and his job with the B'nai B'rith Youth Organization and briefly considered becoming a rabbi until he heard that not only would he have to get a college degree but after the nine years of combined university and rabbinical study, he's still only be earning $5.000 a year. "I thought that's stupid. I was already earning $5,000 a year. So I decided to stay with what I was doing.

(In one of many parenthetical asides as Haves talks about his life, he tells how he could not afford to go to college, but—and this is the point he's making—he was so poorly counseled in high school that he had no concept of community colleges where he could go for free or of the availability of loans nor, apparently, scholarships.)

In any case, when Haves decided to stay with B'nai B'rith, he was advised by Julius Bisno, founder of AZA, that: "If you're going to make this (Jewish community work) a career, get into fund raising." (Bisno, as Haves describes him, was like a mentor, and he's requested proceeds from the Chai dinner-dance to benefit the Julius Bisno Learning Center at BBYO's Sam Beber Camp outside Milwaukee.)

The next years saw Haves move from New York to Los Angeles to Connecticut and back to Los Angeles again. In 1948, he transferred from the BBYO to the Anti-Defamation League, probably B'nai B'rith's best-known adjunct.

All along the way, however, he's always been doing other things—some related, some not—as a volunteer. It's like an irresistible urge: going to meetings, speaking out and then, such a strange surprise, finding himself in some sort of leadership position with (just a sampling) B'nai B'rith District 4's United Jewish Welfare Fund and senior citizen housing committees, Los Angeles BBYO Adisory Board and Friends of Hillel (another B'nai B'rith adjunct), Western Regional Board of the Jewish Federation Council and a slew of committees connected with that, Los Angeles' Community Relations Committee and Jewish War Veterans.

Then there's everything he's doing in Pacific Palisades. He and his wife moved to a white-stuccoed condominium project in Palisades Highlands, an affluent neighborhood just northwest of the Palisades, seven years ago. Now he's not only a member of the Pacific Palisades Community Council, but president of the umbrella group for 13 homeowners associations, a position that has him acting as an ombudsman for about 1,000 homes with state, county and city governments. Not surprisingly, somewhere along the line people started referring to him as "the mayor of Palisades Highlands."

FOUNDED UNIT

Haves founded Ketubah unit of B'nai B'rith, the group that is honoring him. He writes its monthly newsletter, which is not simply a rundown of B'nai B'rith affairs but always includes a few synopses of news articles Haves has read and found enlightening. In 1956, he put into motion Operation Womanpower, a project that brought blacks and Jews together to advance mutal interests. He was involved in the early days of the television show, "This Is Judaism," and won a National Conference of Christians and Jews Media Award for his special show on "rumors." At various times he's been involved with projects to advance cross-town busing and build a park and has coached Little League baseball and assisted with Boy Scouts. After his first wife died in 1960 and he raised his children alone for six years, he was selected Bellagio Road School's Father of the Year.

As Haves talks about all this, it's like a series of stories all interwoven with a Dickensian cast of characters who appear, disappear, then pop up clear across the country in a tale 45 minutes later.

At home with Ethel Haves, whom he married in 1966, he conducts a tour of the house, stopping at various paintings she's done to talk about her training and how he sees this particular period in her creativity. Their multi-level condominium is not so much small as compact, collections and books filling the wall space, individual work areas overflowing onto the other's. Then the two sit side by side on the sofa, their interaction somehow both affectionate, yet giving the impression of an ongoing race of wills.

TALK POLITICS

They talk politics he relating how the Jewish War Veterans in 1967 sent him to Vietnam and he returned and "took on the Jewish community. I used to speak defending the American position in Vietnam. We just couldn't let the commies take over."

It's she who points how, though they met on a blind date, "we came from different worlds." They merged families, he instituting family Passovers, getting everyone into their Jewishness. Nothing happened easily. Their two sets of children—his son and daughter, her two daughters, all in their early teens when the couple married—were not the Brady Bunch. Then there was her drinking.

The subject weaves in and out of any conversation about their lives. He talks about the change of body chemistry that made her mere drinking a matter of alcoholism. "The thing that's important about drinking," she interrupts, "is what do you do to get to that point where you don't want to drink anymore. For me, it was just time to stop."

They talk about the city, agreeing that if they were running Los Angeles they'd break it into burroughs.

"The Street Fair downtown, that's great. But why don't we have street fairs in four different parts of the city? They bring people together," she says.

Then Haves, with his wife nodding in assent: "There are 30,000 people in Pacific Palisades. And there's no police department, no precinct house. You've got to go to Purdue (Avenue—West Los Angeles division headquarters for the LAPD) whenever anything happens. So why do you think we worry about security?"

A grin of recognition as Haves recognized that he'd turned a simple conversation into a town meeting.

"That's what gets me angry. That's why I've got to express myself. I go to meetings and shout, no, I speak up . . . my mama, she said in Yiddish, 'Why do you always eat your heart out whenever you speak?'

REPAYING THE DEBT

"I was always impassioned, even as a kid." Several days later over lunch in Century City, Haves was on that podium again. First it's fund raising and the difficulty of getting alumni of a program like AZA to remember how they benefited and to repay that debt. He's kept the names of everyone he ever met, ever stayed with while hitchhiking through the country to those AZA conventions in the '30s. He really thought he'd have a much bigger response for this Julius Bisno Learning Center. After all, the people he knew also knew Bisno, such a wonderful man.

Of course, fund raising itself is in the doldrums, he acknowledged. Even when a drive is going well, like the recent one for B'nai B'rith Service Fund to advance the work of ADL, BBYO and Hillel—most of the donations are "from the biggies." Not, as it should be, from anyone whose life was ever touched by B'nai B'rith.

He shook his head. Fund raising. "It's not a science. It's an art. The key is the ability to relate to people. A fund-raiser finds a person who has the power and the influence, and he motivates that person to raise money. How does the City of Hope raise so much money? They get a guy in a particular industry who has a lot of power and a testimonial is held for him. Works every time."

The stories go on. His time in the service: a chronological rundown on the quadruple bypass he had in 1980; how back in 1969 he revolutionized the ADL's fund raising with his idea of honoring a celebrity who exemplified what the organization believed in and upped attendance at the annual ball from 300 or 400 to close to 2,000; how when he volunteered for the service, he was turned down because of a deviated septum, so he was sent to the Eddie Rickenbacker Foundation which found a sponsor to finance an operation on the condition that he write his sponsor all during the war. "The guy was a patent attorney in Philadelphia. He'd never known a Jewish boy. He took me to his club. I'll never forget that. It was a real good exchange."

Haves and his letters. To publications, to people he reads about, to old friends, to everyone he's ever met, even old girlfriends.

"Ethel thinks I need everybody to like me," he mused. It might be true. He's long known that he's motivated by a need for recognition. The middle son in his family, his older brother was handsome and the younger always sick. "They always used to call me Bulldog," he said with a grin. "Actually I think now I've gotten to be better looking than my older brother."

But motivation, he's thought that out, and "from where I sit, I got involved because No. 1, it gave me a sense of accomplishment, satisfaction, ego. Some people talk about being motivated by higher ideal. I think we're motivated by self-interest. The secret of being human is reaching out and touching somebody. That's where I draw the line between self-interest and pure selfishness. The only dues you pay to be a member of a democracy, for example, are to get out and vote. And that's self-interest.

"There's a second reason. As a kid, I used to ask myself 'Who am I? How do I relate?' It's simple, but logical. What really counts is my little world. You've got to reach out and touch someone. My world is my family and my Jewish family, but that's one reason why I was never a zealot. My people have got to reach out. Otherwise there's war, tensions.

"I've always stuck out my hand in friendship. And I feel good knowing I did it."

That broad grin again ("I've always had a nice smile") as he thought about all the conversation that had transpired. "A lot of peope get nervous when they speak. I never have. And I still speak with that same passion I had as a kid.

"My doctor says it's good for me. Gets it out of my system."

At 11:30 a.m. the proceedings commenced, as follows:

THE INAUGURAL CEREMONY

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, Mr. Vice President, fellow citizens, we celebrate today the 50th Inauguration of the President and Vice President of the United States and the beginning of a Presidential term that brings us to the threshold of the third century of American constitutional government.

I will ask the Reverend Timothy S. Healy, president of Georgetown University, to offer the invocation.

INVOCATION

Reverend HEALY. Let us offer this prayer for the President and Vice President and their families, for the people and Government of these United States, for men and women of good will everywhere, captive and free, who watch us today.

Please join me in saying the words our Lord taught us.

Our Father, Who art in heaven,
Hallowed be Thy Name.
Thy kingdom come.
Thy will be done,
On Earth as it is in heaven.
Give us this day our daily bread.
And forgive us our trespasses,
As we forgive those who trespass against us.
And lead us not into temptation,
But deliver us from evil.
For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

Mr. MATHIAS. Jessye Norman will now sing "Simple Gifts," one of the songs in Aaron Copland's "Old American Songs."

[Jessye Norman, soprano, sang "Simple Gifts" from "Old American Songs."]

[Applause.]

Mr. MATHIAS. I now ask Rabbi Alfred Gottschalk, president of Hebrew Union College, of Cincinnati, to offer a prayer.

PRAYER

Rabbi GOTTSCHALK. We the people turn to You, O God, in prayer. We have come again to this place which stirs our hearts to reaffirm the highest ideals of our Nation. The sacred oaths about to be pronounced in Your name reflect the awesome responsibilities entrusted to our President and Vice President by the American people. May You, who are the rock of ages, guide them in protecting the Constitution of our beloved Commonwealth, founded in faith, which ensures unity without uniformity. Sustain them, O God, as they advance the American way which "gives to bigotry no sanction," to "malevolence no hope."

O source of all life, enshrine in their hearts the knowledge that all are created in Your image and that life—Your gift to us—is sacred.

Inspire our leaders to defeat hunger and hurt, to promote compassion and to find successful ways to assure the weak their share of America's promise. In humility, we pray that this opportunity for renewal will advance reconciliation in the family of nations, guaranteeing peace in our world and tranquility in the farthest reaches of our universe. May those who follow us, our children and our children's children, bless our President and Vice President, their families, and all those associated with them in Government, and may all remember this time and this administration as that in which their future was made secure.

O God, may You, who makes peace in high places, help us here on Earth to find the way to peace.

Blessed are You, O God. Aleichem Shalom, grantor of peace. Amen.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH OF OFFICE TO THE VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. MATHIAS. Justice Potter Stewart will administer the oath of office to the Vice President.

Associate Justice Potter Stewart administered to the Vice President the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution, which he repeated, as follows:

I, GEORGE HERBERT WALKER BUSH, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

[Applause.]

Mr. MATHIAS. The University of Maryland Chorus, under the direction of Dr. Paul Traver, will now sing the first section of Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom."

[The University of Maryland Chorus and the United States Marine Band, under the direction of Paul Traver, rendered "The God Who Gave Us Life," from "The Testament of Freedom," by Randall Thompson.]

[Applause.]

Mr. MATHIAS. I will now ask the President's own pastor, the Reverend Donn Moomaw, of Bel Air Presbyterian Church, to offer a prayer.

PRAYER

Reverend MOOMAW. Let us all unite in prayer.

Spirit of the Living God,

Fall afresh on us.

Come, Father, with cleansing power

And remove all things from us that would impede Your purpose and thwart Your plans.

Forgive our pride and arrogance before each other and other nations of the world.

May we, with Godly grace, weep with those who weep and rejoice with those who work for a just and free world.

Grant us, O Father, the courage and the compassion to stand in solidarity with the poor, the needy, the dispossessed, and the disadvantaged.

May the President and Vice President of these United States and all who stand with them in their desire for peace receive, first, the peace of Christ, and in all things seek first not the kingdom of plenty nor the kingdom of political superiority, but may they seek humbly first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness.

In the name of the King, even Jesus Christ our Lord, we pray. Amen.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH OF OFFICE TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. MATHIAS. The Chief Justice will now administer the oath to the President.

Mr. Chief Justice BURGER. Mr. President, are you ready to take the oath?

President REAGAN. I am.

Mr. Chief Justice BURGER. Then raise your right hand and repeat after me.

The Chief Justice of the United States, Warren Earl Burger, administered to the President the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution, which he repeated, as follows:

I, Ronald Reagan, do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. So help me God.

Mr. Chief Justice BURGER. Congratulations.

[Applause.]

[Four ruffles and flourishes, "Hail to the Chief," and 21-gun salute.]

INAUGURAL ADDRESS

President REAGAN. Senator MATHIAS, Chief Justice Burger, Vice President BUSH, Speaker O'NEILL, Senator DOLE, Reverend Clergy, members of my family and friends, and my fellow citizens:

This day has been made brighter with the presence here of one who, for a time, has been absent—Senator JOHN STENNIS.

God bless you and welcome back.

[Applause.]

There is, however, one who is not with us today: Representative GILLIS LONG of Louisiana left us last night. I wonder if we could all join in a moment of silent prayer.

[Moment of silent prayer.]

Amen.

There are no words adequate to express my thanks for the great honor that you have bestowed on me. I will do my utmost to be deserving of your trust.

This is, as Senator MATHIAS told us, the 50th time that we the people have celebrated this historic occasion. When the first President, George Washington, placed his hand upon the Bible, he stood less than a single day's journey by horseback from raw, untamed wilderness.

There were 4 million Americans in a union of 13 States. Today we are 60 times as many in a union of 50 States. We have lighted the world with our inventions, gone to the aid of mankind wherever in the world there was a cry for help, journeyed to the Moon and safely returned.

So much has changed. And yet we stand together as we did two centuries ago.

When I took this oath 4 years ago, I did so in a time of economic stress. Voices were raised saying we had to look to our past for the greatness and glory. But we, the present-day Americans, are not given to looking backward. In this blessed land, there is always a better tomorrow.

Four years ago, I spoke to you of a new beginning and we have accomplished that. But in another sense, our new beginning is a continuation of that beginning created two centuries ago when, for the first time in history, government, the people said, was not our master, it is our servant; its only power that which we the people allow it to have.

That system has never failed us, but, for a time, we failed the system. We asked things of government that government was not equipped to give. We yielded authority to the National Government that properly belonged to States or to local governments or to the people themselves. We allowed taxes and inflation to rob us of our earnings and savings and watched the great industrial machine that had made us the most productive people on Earth slow down and the number of unemployed increase.

By 1980, we knew it was time to renew our faith, to strive with all our strength toward the ultimate in individual freedom consistent with an orderly society.

We believed then and now there are no limits to growth and human progress when men and women are free to follow their dreams. And we were right.

[Applause.]

And we were right to believe that. Tax rates have been reduced, inflation cut dramatically, and more people are employed than ever before in our history.

We are creating a nation once again vibrant, robust, and alive. But there are many mountains yet to climb. We will not rest until every American enjoys the fullness of freedom, dignity, and opportunity as our birthright. It is our birthright as citizens of this great Republic, and we'll meet this challenge.

These will be years when Americans have restored their confidence and tradition of progress; when our values of faith, family, work, and neighborhood were restated for a modern age; when our economy was finally freed from government's grip; when we made sincere efforts at meaningful arms reduction, rebuilding our defenses, our economy, and developing new technologies, and helped preserve peace in a troubled world; when Americans courageously supported the struggle for liberty, self-government, and free enterprise throughout the world, and turned the tide of history away from totalitarian darkness and into the warm sunlight of human freedom.

[Applause.]

My fellow citizens, our Nation is poised for greatness. We must do what we know is right and do it with all our might. Let history say of us, these were golden years—when the American Revolution was reborn, when freedom gained new life, when America reached for her best.

Our two-party system has served us well over the years, but never better than in those times of great challenge when we came together not as Democrats or Republicans, but as Americans united in a common cause.

[Applause.]

Two of our Founding Fathers, a Boston lawyer named Adams and a Virginia planter named Jefferson, members of that remarkable group who met in Independence Hall and dared to think they could start the world over again, left us an important lesson. They had become political rivals in the Presidential election of 1800. Then years later, when both were retired, and age had softened their anger, they began to speak to each other again through letters. A bond was reestablished between those two who had helped create this Government of ours.

In 1826, the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, they both died. They died on the same day, within a few hours of each other, and that day was the Fourth of July.

In one of those letters exchanged in the sunset of their lives, Jefferson wrote:

It carries me back to the times when, beset with difficulties and dangers, we were fellow laborers in the same cause, struggling for what is most valuable to man, his right to self-government. Laboring always at the same oar, with some wave ever ahead threatening to overwhelm us, and yet passing harmless . . . we rode through the storm with heart and hand.

Well, with heart and hand, let us stand as one today: One people under God determined that our future shall be worthy of our past. As we do, we must not repeat the well-intentioned errors of our past. We must never again abuse the trust of working men and women, by sending their earnings on a futile chase after the spiraling demands of a bloated Federal Establishment. You elected us in 1980 to end this prescription for disaster, and I don't believe you reelected us in 1984 to reverse course.

[Applause.]

At the heart of our efforts is one idea vindicated by 25 straight months of economic growth: Freedom and incentives unleash the drive and entrepreneurial genius that are the core of human progress. We have begun to increase the rewards for work, savings, and investment, reduce the increase in the cost and size of government and its interference in people's lives.

We must simplify our tax system, make it more fair, and bring the rates down for all who work and earn. We must think anew and move with a new boldness, so every American who seeks work can find work; so the least among us shall have an equal chance to achieve the greatest things—to be heroes who heal our sick, feed the hungry, protect peace among nations, and leave this world a better place.

The time has come for a new American Emancipation—a great national drive to tear down economic barriers and liberate the spirit of enterprise in the most distressed areas of our country. My friends, together we can do this, and do it we must, so help me God.

From new freedom will spring new opportunities for growth, a more productive, fulfilled and united people, and a stronger America—an America that will lead the technological revolution, and also open its mind and heart and soul to the treasures of literature, music and poetry, and the values of faith, courage, and love.

A dynamic economy, with more citizens working and paying taxes, will be our strongest tool to bring down budget deficits. But an almost unbroken 50 years of deficit spending has finally brought us to a time of reckoning.

We have come to a turning point, a moment for hard decisions. I have asked the Cabinet and my staff a question, and now I put the same question to all of you: If not us, who? And if not now, when? It must be done by all of us going forward with a program aimed at reaching a balanced budget. We can then begin reducing the national debt.

I will shortly submit a budget to the Congress aimed at freezing Government program spending for the next year. Beyond that, we must take further steps to permanently control Government's power to tax and spend.

We must act now to protect future generations from Government's desire to spend its citizens' money and tax them into servitude when the bills come due. Let us make it unconstitutional for the Federal Government to spend more than the Federal Government takes in.

[Applause.]

We have already started returning to the people and to State and local governments responsibilities better handled by them. Now, there is a place for the Federal Government in matters of social compassion. But our fundamental goals must be to reduce dependency and upgrade the dignity of those who are infirm or disadvantaged. And here a growing economy and support from family and community offer our best chance for a society where compassion is a way of life, where the old and infirm are cared for, the young and, yes, the unborn protected, and the unfortunate looked after and made self-sufficient.

[Applause.]

And there is another area where the Federal Government can play a part. As an older American, I remember a time when people of different race, creed, or ethnic origin in our land found hatred and prejudice installed in social custom and, yes, in law. There is no story more heartening in our history than the progress that we have made toward the "brotherhood of man" that God intended for us. Let us resolve there will be no turning back or hesitation on the road to an America rich in dignity and abundant with opportunity for all our citizens.

[Applause.]

Let us resolve that we the people will build an American opportunity society in which all of us—white and black, rich and poor, young and old—will go forward together arm in arm. Again, let us remember that though our heritage is one of blood lines from every corner of the Earth, we are all Americans pledged to carry on this last, best hope of man on Earth.

[Applause.]

I have spoken of our domestic goals and the limitations which we should put on our National Government. Now let me turn to to a task which is the primary responsibility of National Government—the safety and security of our people.

Today we utter no prayer more fervently than the ancient prayer for peace on Earth. Yet history has shown that peace will not come nor will our freedom be preserved by good will alone. There are those in the world who scorn our vision of human dignity and freedom. One nation, the Soviet Union, has conducted the greatest military buildup in the history of man, building arsenals of awesome offensive weapons.

We have made progress in restoring our defense capability. But much remains to be done. There must be no wavering by us, nor any doubts by others, that America will meet her responsibilities to remain free, secure, and at peace.

[Applause.]

There is only one way safely and legitimately to reduce the cost of national security, and that is to reduce the need for it. And this we are trying to do in negotiations with the Soviet Union. We are not just discussing limits on a further increase of nuclear weapons. We seek, instead, to reduce their number. We seek the total elimination one day of nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth.

[Applause.]

Now, for decades, we and the Soviets have lived under the threat of mutual assured destruction; if either resorted to the use of nuclear weapons, the other could retaliate and destroy the one who had started it. Is there either logic or morality in believing that if one side threatens to kill tens of millions of our people, our only recourse is to threaten killing tens of millions of theirs?

I have approved a research program to find, if we can, a security shield that would destroy nuclear missiles before they reach their target. It wouldn't kill people, it would destroy weapons. It wouldn't militarize space, it would help demilitarize the arsenals of Earth. It would render nuclear weapons obsolete. We will meet with the Soviets, hoping that we can agree on a way to rid the world of the threat of nuclear destruction.

We strive for peace and security, heartened by the changes all around us. Since the turn of the century, the number of democracies in the world has grown fourfold. Human freedom is on the march, and nowhere more so than our own hemisphere. Freedom is one of the deepest and noblest aspirations of the human spirit. People worldwide hunger for the right of self-determination, for those inalienable rights that make for human dignity and progress.

America must remain freedom's staunchest friend, for freedom is our best ally——

[Applause.]

And it is the world's only hope, to conquer poverty and preserve peace. Every blow we inflict against poverty will be a blow against its dark allies of oppression and war. Every victory for human freedom will be a victory for world peace.

So we go forward today, a Nation still mighty in its youth and powerful in its purpose. With our alliances strengthened, with our economy leading the world to a new age of economic expansion, we look forward to a world rich in possibilities. And all this because we have worked and acted together, not as members of political parties, but as Americans.

My friends, we live in a world that is lit by lightning. So much is changing and will change, but so much endures, and transcends time.

History is a ribbon, always unfurling; history is a journey. And as we continue our journey, we think of those who traveled before us. We stand together again at the steps of this symbol of our democracy—or we would have been standing at the steps if it hadn't gotten so cold. Now we are standing inside this symbol of our democracy. Now we hear again the echoes of our past.

A General falls to his knees in the hard snow of Valley Forge; a lonely President paces the darkened halls, and ponders his struggle to preserve the Union; the men of the Alamo call out encouragement to each other; a settler pushes west and sings a song, and the song echoes out forever and fills the unknowing air.

It is the American sound. It is hopeful, big-hearted, idealistic, daring, decent, and fair. That's our heritage; that is our song. We sing it still. For all our problems, our differences, we are together as of old, as we raise our voices to the God who is the Author of this most tender music. And may He continue to hold us close as we fill the world with our sound—sound in unity, affection, and love. One people under God, dedicated to the dream of freedom that He has placed in the human heart, called upon now to pass that dream on to a waiting and hopeful world.

God bless you and may God bless America.

[Applause.]

Mr. MATHIAS. I'll ask the Reverend Peter Gomes, minister in the Memorial Church of Harvard University, to pronounce the benediction. Following the benediction, these proceedings will be concluded by the playing of "The National Anthem" by the Marine Corps Band.

Reverend GOMES. Let us pray.

Almighty God, who has given us this good land for our heritage: We humbly beseech Thee that we may always prove ourselves a people mindful of Thy favor and glad to do Thy will. Bless our land with honorable industry, sound learning, and pure manners. Save us from discord, violence, and confusion, and the frailty of our own hearts. Defend our liberties, preserve our unity, and fashion into one united people the multitudes brought hither out of many kindreds and tongues. Endue with the spirit of wisdom, prudence, and fortitude the President and the Vice President of these United States and all those to whom is entrusted the authority of government, to the end that justice and peace may flourish at home and abroad. Make us, with them, equal to our high trusts: reverent in the use of freedom, just in the exercise of power, generous in the protection of weakness. May wisdom and compassion be the stability of our times, and our deepest trust in Thee, in whom we live, and move, and have our being. Unto Thee we ascribe all honor and glory, and, in thanksgiving and in hope, we commend now to Thy eternal protection ourselves, our Nation, and our world. Amen.

"The National Anthem" was played by the United States Marine Band, audience standing.

[Applause.]

The inaugural ceremonies were concluded at 12:15 p.m.

The Senate met at 4 p.m. and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

I said to the man who stood at the gate of the year, "Give me a light that I may tread safely into the unknown." And he replied, "Go out into the darkness and put your hand into the hand of God. That shall be to you better than light and safer than a known way."

The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and he delighted in His way.

Father of Light, thank You for beginnings. Thank You for the lessons of the past and the opportunities of the future, bright with hope, when we walk with our hands in Yours.

May the next 2 years of Congress and 4 years for the President and Vice President be under Your continuous direction and blessing.

Imponderable issues face our leadership, Father: the mammoth national debt; the persistent deficit; the needs of the elderly, the unemployed, the poor, and the oppressed; moral decay; crime; terrorism; and the relentless threat of nuclear holocaust.

Gracious God, grant our leaders the humility and good sense to put their hands in the hand of God and to move into the irresistible future, trusting in your wisdom, power, and compassion.

In the name of Him who is the way, the truth, and the light. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 2 p.m. on Tuesday, January 22, 1985.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR THE RECORD TO REMAIN OPEN UNTIL 5 P.M. TODAY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD remain open until 5 p.m. today for the introduction of bills and resolutions and the submission of statements.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS ON TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the two leaders on tomorrow, the following Senators be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes each, or special orders: myself, the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON], Senator STAFFORD, and Senator LEAHY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it possible to add my name to that list?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I should like to give Members present and those who may be listening a brief idea of what may happen during the remainder of the week.

Tomorrow, January 22, we will convene at 2 o'clock. There will be 1 hour of special orders to eulogize the late Senator George Aiken. There will be a brief period for morning business sometime following that special order.

On Wednesday, January 23, the Senate will not be in session.

On Thursday, January 24, we will convene at noon, but we may or may not be in session. I hope to determine that this afternoon.

There is no reason to be in session on Friday unless committees have reported nominations from the White House or the Committee on Committees completes its work and we have resolutions pending in that area.

As I understand it, we have just given the distinguished minority leader, Senator BYRD, details—not full details yet—of how we are coming along on our side of the Committee on Committees; and it goes without saying that it is not possible for the distinguished minority leader to act until we make certain determinations.

We have made progress in reducing the size of a number of committees, and we believe that most Members of the Senate will applaud the efforts of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. MATTINGLY], who is the chairman of the Committee on Committees.

In the event that nominations will be reported, we hope to be able to confirm those nominations on Friday of this week. If not, we will not be in session.

NOTICE CONCERNING ANNUAL REGISTRATION OF MASS MAILINGS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, in view of the approaching February 1 filing date, I would like to remind Senators of the requirements concerning registration of mass mailings under Senate rule 40.

Members are required to register annually such mass mailings. The 1984 calendar year filing will be due on February 1, 1985. Mass mailings are also accepted on a "as mailed" basis if Members so desire.

For your information, following are excerpts from rule 40:

. . . 3. (a) When a Senator disseminates information under the frank, by a mass mailing (as defined in Section 3210(a)(6)(E) of Title 39, United States Code), the Senator shall register annually with the Secretary of the Senate such mass mailings. Such registration shall be made by filing with the Secretary a copy of the matter mailed and providing, on a form supplied by the Secretary, a description of the group or groups of persons to whom the mass mailing was mailed.

(b) the Secretary of the Senate shall promptly make available for public inspection and copying a copy of the matter mailed, and a description of the group or groups of persons to whom the mass mailing was mailed . . .

Mass mailing registrations should be filed with the Senate Office of Public Records, 232 Hart Building, Washington, DC 20510, telephone 224-0322. Registration forms can be obtained at that office.

NOTICE CONCERNING THE YEAR END REPORT REQUIRED BY THE FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT, AS AMENDED

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the mailing and filing date for the January 31 year end report required by the Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended is Thursday, January 31, 1985. Principal campaign committees supporting Senate candidates file their reports with the Senate Office of Public Records, 232 Hart Building, Washington, DC 20510, telephone: 202-224-0322.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair, and I thank the distinguished majority leader.

SENATOR STROM THURMOND

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the office of President pro tempore of the U.S. Senate is an honor that is awarded only to a very senior Member of the majority party. Since 1946, with only one exception, it has been conferred on the most senior Member of the party in control of the Senate.

On January 3, the Senate continued this practice by electing the most senior Republican Member, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], as President pro tempore, a position he has held with distinction since the first session of the 97th Congress.

I have served with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] since I entered the Senate on January 3, 1959. During these past 26 years, I have come to respect and admire his ability and dedication to his duties as a Member of this body. Since the 97th Congress, he has served as chairman of the Judiciary Committee along with performing the additional duties of President pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] has approached his new responsibilities with his customary diligence and enthusiasm.

One of the most visible assignments of the President pro tempore is to preside over the Senate when the Vice President is not present. While the presiding job is shared among Republican Senators, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] as President pro tempore is almost always present to preside over the daily opening of each Senate session.

A less publicly visible, but extremely important, duty is to be available to sign duly enrolled bills and joint resolutions on behalf of the Senate before the legislation is sent to the President for his consideration. This responsibility often involves being present after the Senate has completed its work for the day; and in the case of a sine die adjournment—or when the Senate recesses for legislative breaks from time to time during the year—it can mean that the President pro tempore is required to remain in Washington for a number of days while these various measures are being processed and properly enrolled.

Our President pro tempore, Senator STROM THURMOND, has carried out this portion of his responsibilities with particular diligence.

The Senate is fortunate indeed to have the services of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] as its President pro tempore. I wish to extend my personal congratulations to him on his election for the third time as President pro tempore, and I look forward to working with him for the duration of the 99th Congress.

The President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND] is, first of all, a gentleman. He is liked by everybody on both sides of the aisle. He is a reasonable man. He is a courteous man. He is an understanding man. He is a man who is considerate of the problems of the leadership, and is always willing to listen to any Senator who has an opposite view, and we on this side of the aisle respect him for that.

I have been honored to have the opportunity to serve with Senator THURMOND over these 26 years. Senator THURMOND has been and is a man of the highest caliber and the highest integrity.

I remember the late Senator Dick Russell saying to me one day, when we were talking about STROM THURMOND, "He is absolutely fearless."

He has the courage of his convictions. He works hard, as hard as any Member of this body. I am proud to be able to call STROM THURMOND my friend.

(Mr. GORTON assumed the chair.)

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the distinguished minority leader yield?

Mr. BYRD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I feel very humbled by the kind remarks of the distinguished minority leader. I wish to express to him my sincere appreciation.

I came here in January 1955, and I have known the distinguished minority leader ever since he came to the Senate. He served in the House of Representatives before he came to the Senate.

I have great respect and admiration for him. He is one of the finest parliamentarians I have ever known in the Senate. He is a man of character and integrity.

Those words coming from him mean a great deal for me. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished President pro tempore.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as I indicated on the opening day of Congress, I think everyone, as the Senator well stated, on each side of the aisle, has the greatest respect for the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Having served with Senator THURMOND—in fact he is my chairman on the Judiciary Committee—I can underscore his total fairness, accessibility, and willingness to listen to opposite points of view; and I must say, in my role as I am sort of feeling around what I do in the leadership role, I found my friend from South Carolina to be very helpful, very understanding, and willing to sort of give me a little guidance from time to time, and that I also appreciate very much.

So I wish to join my distinguished colleague from West Virginia in commending the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRD. I thank my friend.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to thank the able Senator from Kansas, the distinguished majority leader, for his kind remarks.

It has been a great pleasure to serve with him. I feel he is going to make one of the greatest majority leaders the Senate has had, and I assure him of my full cooperation.

I thank him for his kind words.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, will the minority leader yield for a moment?

Mr. BYRD. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thank Senator BYRD.

Mr. President, let me just add very swiftly my congratulations and respect to Senator STROM THURMOND.

He served with my father in this Chamber which was a great honor to my father.

I met STROM THURMOND in 1963 in this Chamber, and I serve, as Senator DOLE does, on the Judiciary Committee. This is my chairman as it is Senator DOLE's chairman. In my particular line of work, which has been dabbling in the mysteries of immigration reform—an issue filled with about every kind of human emotion one can conjure: emotion, fear, guilt, and racism—this man has been so supportive, so kind, so expressedly optimistic as I deal with that, and I am deeply appreciative.

He has been of marvelous assistance to me and his wise counsel and guidance have aided me so greatly in the Senate.

So to STROM THURMOND, who is always gracious, thanks for your work with me in the Veterans' Affairs Committee as you guided me through that shoal, as has another remarkable veteran, Senator DOLE.

So, I just wish to add my note and tell what a gracious addition it is to have you, sir, and Nancy, and Nancy Moore, Strom, Paul, and Julie as remarkable friends of ours, Ann and myself. I deeply appreciate it.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I thank the able Senator from Wyoming for his kind remarks.

He came on the Judiciary Committee and made one of the ablest members there. He is chairman of the Immigration Subcommittee, and I do not know of any Member of the Senate who has done a finer job within the subcommittee than he has with immigration. He is Mr. Immigration. He knows more about it than any other person I have come in contact with.

It has been a pleasure to know him and his family.

I thank him again for his kind remarks.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH OF OFFICE TO SENATOR ROCKEFELLER

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, for the RECORD, I wish to make note of the fact that on January 15 while the Senate was in adjournment, the oath of office was administered to JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, IV, as the junior Senator from West Virginia.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT ORDER

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the various measures which I introduced on January 3 to change the rules of the Senate be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SEC. 6. The use of tape duplications of broadcast coverage of the proceedings of the Senate for political or commercial purposes is strictly prohibited; and any such tape duplication furnished to any person shall be made on the condition that it not be used for political or commercial purposes.

SEC. 7. Any changes in the regulations made by this resolution shall be made only by Senate resolution. However, the Committee on Rules and Administration may adopt such procedures and such regulations, which do not contravene the regulations made by this resolution, as it deems necessary to assure the proper implementation of the purposes of this resolution.

SEC. 8. Such funds as may be necessary (but not in excess of $2,500,000) to carry out this resolution shall be expended from the contingent funds of the Senate.

SEC. 9. Rule XXVI, paragraph 7.(a)(1), is amended to read as follows:

(a)(1) Except as provided in this paragraph, each committee and each subcommittee thereof is authorized to fix the number of its members (but not less than one-third of its entire membership) who shall constitute a quorum thereof for the transaction of such business as may be considered by said committee, except that no measure or matter or recommendation shall be reported from any committee unless a majority of the committee are physically present, and no report or legislative or executive measure or matter from a committee shall be accepted at the desk except on the representation of the committee chairman that it was not reported by polling."

SEC. 10 Rule XXX, paragraph 1(b), is amended to read as follows:

SEC. 13. Paragraph 4 of rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" after "4"; and

(2) by adding at the end of such paragraph the following new subparagraph:

"(b) If a point of order is made by any Senator against an amendment to a general appropriations bill on the ground that such amendment proposes general legislation or proposes a limitation or restriction not authorized by law and is to take effect or cease to be effective upon the happening of a contingency, it shall not be in order to raise the defense of germaneness unless there is House legislative language on that subject contained in the bill."

SEC. 14. Rule VIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"3. Debate on any motion to proceed to the consideration of any matter, other than an amendment to the Standing Rules of the Senate, made at any time other than the morning hour shall be limited to two hours, to be equally divided between and controlled by the Majority Leader and Minority Leader or their designees, at the conclusion of which, without any intervening action, the Senate shall proceed to vote on the motion."

SEC. 15. Rule XVII, paragraph 5, of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"5. Any measure or matter reported by any standing committee shall not be considered in the Senate unless the report of that committee upon that measure or matter has been available to Members for at least two calendar days (excluding Sundays and legal holidays) prior to the consideration of that measure or matter. If hearings have been held on any such measure or matter so reported, the committee reporting the measure or matter shall make every reasonable effort to have such hearings printed and available for distribution to the Members of the Senate prior to the consideration of such measure or matter in the Senate. This paragraph—

(1) may be waived by joint agreement of the Majority Leader and the Minority Leader of the Senate; and

(2) shall not apply to—

(A) any measure for the declaration of war, or the declaration of a national emergency, by the Congress, and

(B) any executive decision, determination, or action which would become, or continue to be, effective unless disapproved or otherwise invalidated by one or both Houses of Congress."

SEC. 16. Rule XV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended—

(1) by inserting after "Motions" in the caption a semicolon and the following: "GERMANENESS";

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"6. (a) At any time during the consideration of a bill or resolution, it shall twice be in order during a calendar day to move that no amendment, other than the reported committee amendments, which is not germane or relevant to the subject matter of the bill or resolution, or to the subject matter of an amendment proposed by the committee which reported the bill or resolution, shall thereafter be in order. The motion shall be privileged and shall be decided after one hour of debate, without any intervening action, to be equally divided and controlled by the Majority Leader and the Minority Leader or their designees.

"(b) If a motion made under subparagraph (a) is agreed to by an affirmative vote of three-fifths of the Senators present and voting, then any floor amendment not already agreed to (except amendments proposed by the Committee which reported the bill or resolution) which is not germane or relevant to the subject matter of the bill or resolution, or the subject matter of an amendment proposed by the committee which reported the bill or resolution, shall not be in order.

"(c) When a motion made under subparagraph (a) has been agreed to as provided in subparagraph (b) with respect to a bill or resolution, points of order with respect to questions of germaneness or relevancy of amendments shall be decided without debate, except that the Presiding Officer may entertain debate for his own guidance prior to ruling on the point of order. Appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer on such points of order shall be decided without debate.

"(d) Whenever an appeal is taken from a decision of the Presiding Officer on the question of germaneness of an amendment, or whenever the Presiding Officer submits the question of germaneness or relevancy of an amendment to the Senate, the vote necessary to overturn the decision of the Presiding Officer or hold the amendment germane or relevant shall be two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. No amendment proposing sense of the Senate or sense of the Congress language that does not directly relate to the measure or matter before the Senate shall be considered germane."

SEC. 17. Paragraph 7 of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"7. Notwithstanding the provisions of rule II or rule IV or any other rule of the Senate, at any time a motion signed by sixteen Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any measure, motion, other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer, or clerk at the direction of the Presiding Officer, shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and one hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the clerk call the roll, and upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote the question:

" 'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?' "

And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting-except on a measure or motion to amend the Senate rules, in which case the necessary affirmative vote shall be two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn-then said measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

"Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be proposed after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless it had been submitted in writing to the Journal Clerk by 1 o'clock p.m. on the day following the filing of the cloture motion if an amendment in the first degree, or a complete substitute and unless it had been so submitted at least one hour prior to the beginning of the cloture vote if an amendment in the second degree. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate. Whenever an appeal is taken under this rule from a decision of the Presiding Officer on the question of germaneness of an amendment, the vote necessary to overturn the decision of the Presiding Officer shall be two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.

"After no more than twenty hours of consideration of the measure, motion, or other matter on which cloture has been invoked, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the majority leader and minority leader, or their designee, the Senate shall proceed, without any further debate on any question, to vote on the final disposition thereof to the exclusion of all amendments not then actually pending before the Senate at that time and to the exclusion of all motions, except a motion to table, or to reconsider and one quorum call on demand to establish the presence of a quorum (and motions required to establish a quorum) immediately before the final vote begins.

"If, for any reason, a measure or matter is reprinted after cloture has been invoked, amendments which were in order prior to the reprinting of the measure or matter will continue to be in order and may be conformed and reprinted at the request of the amendment's sponsor. The conforming changes must be limited to lineation and pagination.

"No Senator shall call up more than two amendments until every other Senator shall have had the opportunity to do likewise.

"After cloture is invoked, the reading of any amendment, including House amendments, shall be dispensed with.".

Senate Resolution 20—To Amend the Cloture Rule of the Senate

Mr. Byrd submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

S. Res. 20

Resolved, That Paragraph 2 of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"2. Notwithstanding the provisions of rule II or rule IV or any other rule of the Senate, at any time a motion signed by sixteen Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any measure, motion, other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer, or clerk at the direction of the Presiding Officer, shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and one hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the clerk call the roll, and upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by a yea and nay vote the question:

'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting except on a measure or motion to amend the Senate rules, in which case the necessary affirmative vote shall be two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn-then said measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

"Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be proposed after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless it had been submitted in writing to the Journal Clerk by 1 o'clock p.m. on the day following the filing of the cloture motion if an amendment in the first degree or a complete substitute, and unless it had been so submitted at least one hour prior to the beginning of the cloture vote if an amendment in the second degree. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate. Whenever an appeal is taken under this rule from a decision of the Presiding Officer on the question of germaneness of an amendment, the vote necessary to overturn the decision of the Presiding Officer shall be two-thirds of the Senators voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

THE INAUGURATION PROCEEDINGS

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the transcript of the inauguration proceedings conducted today in the rotunda of the Capitol may appear in the RECORD and, I further ask unanimous consent that the transcript of the inauguration proceedings may be printed first in the RECORD for today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority is using his time?

Mr. DOLE. Yes. There is still time remaining to the majority leader?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is.

THANKS TO SENATORS MATHIAS AND FORD

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I take a moment at this time, and I will do so more fully later, to thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland, Senator MATHIAS, along with the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, Senator FORD, for their tireless efforts in the entire inaugural proceedings.

I know the distinguished Senator from Maryland probably has not had any sleep last night because suddenly at 6 o'clock yesterday the parade was canceled and a bit later the outside swearing-in ceremony was canceled, and the Senator from Maryland was calling me looking for something of sympathy and I gave it to him.

Mr. MATHIAS. Moral support.

Mr. DOLE. Moral support. But that was about all I was able to provide.

But I must say along with his wife, Ann, the distinguished Senator from Maryland has done an outstanding job. We are very proud of the Senator from Maryland, proud of the work he has done not only in this event but in many other areas.

THE PRESIDENT'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I also say, and I will have a further statement on this at some later date, that I believe the President has in effect invited Congress to participate in his second term in making these very difficult decisions.

The tone of the President's inaugural address in my view was just right. I do not believe anyone could have been offended by what the President said, whether Democrat, Republican, independent, or someone who just does not care.

The President was not here in any partisan way. He was speaking to the American people, those who voted for him, those who voted against him, and I assume those who did not vote at all.

He stressed, as I think he properly should have stressed, the need for restraint on Federal spending, and I interpret his statement as meaning that is the No. 1 priority, and obviously, arms control, tax simplification, making certain that we improve the quality of life for all Americans, disabled, senior citizens, whatever special cases and vulnerable groups there may be.

So I indicate for the RECORD at this time that the President made an excellent speech. I am very proud to be a Republican and proud to be a supporter of Ronald Reagan and Vice President GEORGE BUSH, and I believe they will find a spirit of cooperation in the Senate and in the House of Representatives that will be welcome in the White House, be important to America, and we will act responsibly. We are prepared to make difficult decisions. We know there are no gimmicks, no painless solutions.

I believe the American people demand it and I believe that the Senate in a bipartisan way will come to grips with the problems we have and the opportunities we have. We will demonstrate to the American people that we have the will to govern.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MATHIAS. He was kind enough to make some reference to the efforts that my wife and I invested in the inaugural proceedings today. Since he has done that, I think I have to set the record straight and to give the credit where the credit is really due, because there has been an extraordinary achievement by personnel of various Government agencies, first of all, to prepare the inauguration as it was originally planned at the west front of the Capitol and then, as of 9 o'clock last night, to convert an immense outside activity into the more compressed ceremony in the rotunda today.

I would be remiss if I let 1 hour further go by without acknowledging that the Joint Committee on the Inaugural, the staff of the Rules Committee, my own personal staff, the staff of the Senate, especially the staff of the press, radio-TV, photographers, and periodical press galleries, the House and Senate Sergeants at Arms, the Capitol Police, the Secret Service, the military representatives who were assigned to the Joint Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies, the members of the White House staff, the members of the Office of the Architect of the Capitol, and the service personnel around the Capitol have all cooperated closely with us. It made me extremely proud to watch these people go into high gear last night, work through the night and make the ceremony possible today.

Mr. President, I take this opportunity to express my profound gratitude to each one of them and my appreciation, which is really very heartfelt. It is a performance that I shall always remember with gratitude and with admiration.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to exceed 30 minutes, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, President Reagan's second inaugural speech is a stirring appeal to shift American resources away from big increases in Federal spending which were designed to meet domestic problems. In this, he is right. But then the President calls for us to shift these resources and more into a larger eventual increase to carry the arms race with the Soviet Union into space. And in this, he is wrong.

In his first inaugural in 1981, the President called for a reduction in Federal spending and a balanced budget by 1984. What happened? Instead of a balanced budget, we have had the biggest deficits by far in the history of our country, deficits three times higher than the country had ever before suffered. Why?

The President called for and won major reductions in Federal taxes to the warm applause of the country. He has also achieved a sharp slowdown in the rate of increase in Federal spending on domestic programs. The deficits have obviously come from a king-size increase in military spending. Combine that with lower taxes. Result: A very fat series of Federal deficits.

And where does the President propose to take the country in the next 4 years? He says he wants to reduce the deficit and move us toward a balanced budget. But will the program he sketched in his second inaugural speech do that? How can it when President Reagan also calls for the Star Wars antimissile defense that the Defense Department itself admits will cost so much it will stagger us? How can such a program reduce the deficit?

The answer is the same old smoke and mirrors routine. The administration achieves a lower deficit while pouring more money into the military and cutting taxes by making some very happy and very unrealistic assumptions about the kind of economy we will have in the next 4 years. Get this: The economy is supposed to boom while interest rates fall and inflation continues to behave. Of course, anything is possible. The Sun might rise in the West tomorrow. The law of gravity might be repealed, so we can all float to work. The Soviet Union might renounce communism, embrace nonviolence, democracy and elect Mother Theresa as its first President. But do not count on any of this. And do not count, on the basis of this stirring inaugural speech, that the next 4 years of President Reagan will bring us any closer to a balanced budget than the first 4 years did.

President Reagan is the hardest President to criticize of any of the seven Presidents who have served since I entered the Senate in 1957. Like President Eisenhower, President Reagan was elected and then reelected by landslides. But unlike President Eisenhower, President Reagan carried into office a philosophy: lower taxes and less goverment; and a program the same as his philosphy that the American people have now obviously strongly endorsed.

Unlike any President since Franklin Roosevelt 40 years ago, President Reagan is what we all admire in an acquaintance and especially in a high Government official—a happy, upbeat, always optimistic personality. When he gives the kind of uplifting, inspiring, patriotic speech he delivered today, almost any American would like to throw his hat in the air and cheer. We love our country. We are proud of our country.

And in some ways, President Reagan has given this country exactly what it needed. We were indeed going much too far in the interference of our Government with our free economic system. The Federal Government was interfering in people's lives far too much. The lumbering dinosaur of a mammoth, swelling Federal Government obviously can not and should not try to do what a State or a city or especially a smaller community can do for its citizens.

As a man named Levy said so well: "If good intentions are combined with stupidity, it is impossible to out-think them." Good intentions combined with stupidity is what the Federal Government has been dealing in for the past 50 years. Some would say that the President brought a new stupidity into the debate. And maybe he did. But it worked. It succeeded and we all like success. At any rate, President Reagan has been half right in cutting domestic spending and half wrong in transferring most of that cut to the military. The America people liked the first half. I know they do not like the military spending second half. So the President was half right. That is not a bad batting average for an American President. Judging by the second inaugural speech, he may not do that well in the next 4 years.

SENATOR GLENN'S WARNING ON NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in the winter 1985 edition of Issues in Science and Technology, our colleague, the distinguished Senator from Ohio [JOHN GLENN], has written an excellent and alarming article entitled: "Nuclear Proliferation: The Current and Future Threat." As we know, Senator GLENN has been the leading expert in the Senate in this field, almost since he entered the Senate 10 years ago.

In his typical, thorough, low key manner, Senator GLENN has set forth a carefully balanced analysis of the growing threat of nuclear weapon proliferation. It is the conviction of many thoughtful experts that far and away the most likely outbreak of nuclear war will come from the explosive spread of nuclear weapons that seems all but inevitable in the next 10 or 20 years. But wait a minute, is the spread of nuclear weapons so very likely? Is it not true that there has been little, if any, nuclear weapon proliferation for the past 20 years in spite of dire predictions again and again throughout this period that unless we mounted a vigorous international antiproliferation crusade nuclear weapons would spread everywhere? What happened? There was a very modest limited effort to slow proliferation. Certainly there was no crusade. Did nuclear weapons proliferate? A little. But only a little.

Twenty years ago five nations—the United States, the Soviet Union, France, the United Kingdom, and China—had nuclear arsenals. Today India has joined the club. Israel and South Africa are quiet, small, side door entrance members. And that is it.

To most of the world it still seems like a two-member game. The world has 50,000 nuclear warheads. More than 95 percent of those warheads are in the custody of the United States and the Soviet Union. The general attitude is that we have plenty to worry about in Soviet nuclear weapons power. But for the rest, forget it. England and France are our firm allies. China is certainly no buddy of the Soviet Union and unlikely to become one for a long time. As for India, Israel, and South Africa, there seems to be no way that any of them no matter how big a nuclear arsenal they acquired could become a threat to the United States. So why the sweat?

Senator GLENN's very timely article explains in detail exactly "why the sweat." Here it is: First we have relied heavily on the International Atomic Energy Agency with its international inspection capability to prevent the transfer of nuclear materials to weapons purposes. Those materials include 48,000 tons of such material including 6.8 tons of separated plutonium and 11 tons of highly enriched uranium. Where are these materials? At 320 sites, and get this, in more than 50 countries. That's right 50 countries. Senator GLENN argues that the IAEA simply does not have the manpower to do the massive inspection job. It has only 156 inspectors. And to do its job properly it would have to change its policies to: First, initiate unannounced inspections, second, end the secrecy surrounding inspection results; third, undertake closer observation of nuclear operations using both instruments and human monitors; and fourth, refuse to allow inspected States an unlimited veto of chosen inspectors. What prospect is there that the IAEA will do all this? Don't hold your breath until it happens.

Second, the problem of maintaining common suppliers standards is likely to worsen as so-called second tier suppliers enter the picture. India, China, South Africa, Argentina, Brazil, Spain, and Niger are all gearing up to compete in the world nuclear export market. And as Senator GLENN points out: the commitment of these countries to a strong nonproliferation regime varies from weak to none.

Third, the U.S. agreement with China for the sale of nuclear technology and materials appeared to provide pitifully inadequate safeguards to begin with. Unless the agreement is conspicuously strengthened to prevent proliferation, it would be seen, as JOHN GLENN points out, by many nations as another blow to their commitment not to proliferate, especially since China is a weapons state and has not signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Fourth, Pakistan seems well on its way to building its own nuclear arsenal. Senator GLENN writes that if Pakistan does test a nuclear explosion, India could retaliate with another test explosion of its own, or it could launch a preemptive military strike to knock out Pakistan's nuclear facilities. It could thus follow the Israel example in knocking out the Iraqi nuclear weapons factory.

Fifth, Israel's nuclear capacity represents a provocative incentive for bitterly hostile Arab States to develop their own nuclear capability.

Sixth, Libyan leader Quadhafi is trying hard to purchase a nuclear weapon.

Seventh, the Ayatollah Khomeni could at any time revive the Shah's aborted attempt to give Iran a potential weapons capability.

Eighth, some nations that are not parties to the Non-Proliferation Treaty receive more technical assistance from the IAEA than do parites to the treaty. Only the United States, Canada, and Australia require all recipients of nuclear trade to satisfy essentially the same safeguard requirements as are required for NPT parties. Because other suppliers are not as careful, Senator GLENN argued that some NPT signatories may just walk away from the treaty.

Ninth, the continued arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union have developed advances in nuclear arms technology that have made nuclear devices, tailor made for both the smaller economies of other nations and State-directed terrorism. Nuclear devices can now be carried by one person, and easily concealed in a small car. This headlong competition to make the supreme military power cheap and easily delivered has added a new and very tempting dimension to nuclear power.

Senator GLENN balances this ominous analysis with the developments that have slowed down proliferation and may continue to do so.

First most nations recognize the limited utility of nuclear weapons. After all even a small nuclear war could mean virtual nuclear suicide.

Second, greater sensitivity to the threat and danger of nuclear proliferation now exists than ever before. Senator GLENN may be right on this. Here's one Senator who is not so sure. If business interests in a country including the United States can make a buck while risking proliferation they go for the buck and often get it.

Third, nuclear suppliers are more cooperative in enforcing safeguards than they have been in the past, says GLENN. Again, I am not sure. I would feel better if we had some concrete examples of such enforcement. It is hard to find such examples in the conduct of this country especially in view of the nuclear agreements we have just made with Sweden and Norway, and may be making with China.

Fourth, Senator GLENN argues that pressure on the weapon states to reduce their arsenals are growing. JOHN GLENN may be right about this. But where is the evidence? Certainly the pressure is not getting meaningful results. We may have reduced our megatonnage and even the number of warheads, but our capacity for delivering our nuclear payload on target has immensely increased. Certainly the United States and the Soviet Union are far, far more formidable nuclear powers than they were 20 or 10 years ago. And the race goes on. And where is the evidence that France, the United Kingdom, and China are not at least as heavily armed with nuclear weapons as they were 10 or 20 years ago?

Fifth, GLENN contends that a combination of energy conservation, alternative technologies and excess oil supplies has dimmed the attractiveness of technologies that pose a high proliferation risk, such as the breeder reactor and the recycling of plutonium for use in conventional reactors. GLENN is dead right here. This is a prime advantage we should build on.

In sum, the GLENN presentation is right on target in assessing the dangers now posed by the threat of proliferation. Anyone who believes that nuclear weapon proliferation is not virtually inevitable unless we find a way to greatly strengthen international antiproliferation policies is living in a dream world. It is coming. It is immensely dangerous, far more threatening than the relatively remote prospect of a Soviet nuclear attack on the United States. And it has had very little attention from this or previous administrations. JOHN GLENN has made a critical contribution to our understanding of our national security responsibilities. It is time we took proliferation and what we do in the event a non-superpower nuclear war breaks out far more seriously.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the GLENN article in the winter 1985 edition of Issues in Science and Technology be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION: THE CURRENT AND FUTURE THREAT

(John H. Glenn)

PROLOGUE: Although the number of nations that openly maintain stockpiles of nuclear weapons has remained constant for nearly 20 years, the delicate fabric of institutional and moral commitments that restrains nuclear proliferation is showing signs of coming unraveled.

In this essay, John H. Glenn, Democratic senator from Ohio, warns that the world could soon face a nuclear arms race in South Asia and the Middle East. At a time when the international agency responsible for safeguarding nuclear materials is becoming increasingly politicized, more and more nations are gaining access to sensitive technology. Glenn, the principal author of the 1978 Nuclear Nonproliferation Act, which tightened controls on U.S. nuclear exports, argues that the mounting threat of proliferation warrants the highest national attention.

John H. Glenn was born in Cambridge, Ohio. He received a B.S. degree from Muskingum College in 1961 after serving as a Marine Corps fighter pilot during World War II and the Korean conflict, and as a jet aircraft test pilot. One of the original seven astronauts in the U.S. space program, on February 20, 1962, he bacame the first American to orbit the earth. He was elected to the U.S. Senate from Ohio in 1974 and serves on the Governmental Affairs and Foreign Relations committees. Glenn, who was a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1984, has written extensively on energy and defense policy and the U.S. space program, and in other forums has offered detailed prescriptions for dealing with the nuclear proliferation problem.

Five nations in the world today overtly manufacture nuclear weapons: the United States, the Soviet Union, Great Britain, France, and China. At least 10 other nations are capable of producing nuclear weapons in a relatively short time; two may already have done so clandestinely. Sixteen other nations are moving toward a nucelar weapons capability, and evidence suggests that there may be military purposes behind the nuclear programs in eight of these countries.

The establishment of Nuclear Emergency Search Teams (NEST) in the United States to investigate threats to detonate nuclear devices or to use nuclear material in some harmful way is testimony to the existence of a terrorist interest in nuclear materials. Nuclear weapons have been designed and tested that can fit into a golf bag.

Thus, while the world's attention has recently been focused on the nuclear arms race between the superpowers, developments are occurring that in the future will put nuclear weapons into the hands of other nations, including some in politically volatile areas of the world. This increases the likelihood of such weapons being used during conflict and threatens us with the specter of terrorist acquisition of portable nuclear explosive devices.

The acquisition of nuclear weapons by one nation tends to encourage proliferation by inducing others to seek a matching nuclear deterrent. This is especially dangerous when the acquiring countries lack the sophisticated command, control, and communications sytems necessary to prevent the unintended use of these weapons in times of crisis. The world has been lulled into a false sense of security on this potentially disastrous issue by a natural preoccupation with the activities of existing nuclear weapon states and by the fact that no new overt nuclear weapon state has come into existence since 1964. Nevertheless, the threat of proliferation is real and growing, and we should accord it the highest level of attention.

During the past 40 years, a variety of national and international policies and institutions have evolved to curtail the spread of nuclear weapons. Collectively, these are known as the world's nonproliferation regime. Foremost in this regime is the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty [NPT], which went into effect in 1970 and has since been signed by 118 nonweapon states and 3 weapon states, Great Britain, the United States, the Soviet Union. Two weapon states, France and China, have not signed. The nations adhering to the treaty, together with France, which has said it will act in accordance with the treaty, account for 98 percent of the world's nuclear power capacity, all of the world's exports of enriched uranium, and almost all of the reprocessing capability.

In essence, the Non-Proliferation Treaty promises full access to peaceful nuclear technology, subject to international safeguards, to any country that promises to forgo acquiring nuclear weapons. The treaty bars signatories from helping other countries to acquire or make nuclear weapons and prohibits nonweapon states from acquiring nuclear weapons or using nuclear energy for any military purpose. It requires non-nuclear weapon states to place under international safeguards all their nuclear facilities in which fissionable material—material suitable for use in nuclear weapons—is used; that is, these facilities must be subject to a system of materials accounting and inspection carried out by the International Atomic Energy Agency [IAEA]. The safeguards process is essentially a record-keeping, not a policing, activity; the IAEA has no authority to impose sanctions against a nation that diverts fissionable material to military purposes.

In return for these restrictions, the treaty guarantees "the inalienable right of all the parties to the treaty to develop research, production and use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes without discrimination" and obligates the parties to "facilitate . . . the fullest possible exchange of equipment, materials and scientific and technological information for the peaceful uses of nuclear energy." The treaty extends this right to acquire and use peaceful nuclear energy even to "peaceful nuclear explosives"—bombs by any other name—for engineering projects and mineral extraction, but restricts possession of explosive devices only to weapon states. Another key article of the treaty requires the nuclear weapon states to "pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament, and on a treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control." Adherence to the provisions of the Non-proliferation Treaty is entirely voluntary. There are no sanctions for violations, and a signatory may withdraw from the treaty on 90-days notice by declaring that its "supreme" interests are jeopardized by extraordinary events "related to the subject matter of the treaty."

Other elements of the nonproliferation regime include: formal and informal agreements among nuclear suppliers to exercise restraint in their exports and to not sell certain kinds of materials or equipment without requiring that safeguards be imposed; alliances and other security arrangements to influence nations to not acquire nuclear weapons; international networks of intelligence gathering and exchange concerning nuclear activities worldwide; and individual national policies, including export laws such as the U.S. Nuclear Nonproliferation Act of 1978, to discourage misuse of nuclear technology. This act is designed to establish tighter criteria for nuclear exports from the United States, to impose controls on the separation and use of plutonium from spent reactor fuel of U.S. origin, and to provide for sanctions against nations that violate safeguards or engage in other actions indicating movement toward a nuclear weapons program.

II

During the past decade, concern has grown worldwide over the issue of horizontal proliferation—the acquisition of nuclear weapons by nations that do not yet have them. This has helped to produce some cooperation among nuclear suppliers to limit voluntarily certain kinds of nuclear trade when proliferation risks are evident. But the extent of cooperation is still inadequate, and major problems remain that could threaten future progress.

Any realistic policy must address two basic elements in horizontal proliferation: the political will and the technical capability of the potential proliferator. West Germany, Japan, Canada, and Sweden have the technical capability to produce nuclear weapons but have chosen not to do so because they believe their security concerns are best met by other means.

Thus, a key factor in preventing horizontal proliferation is to assist nations in meeting their legitimate security needs, thereby reducing their motivation to obtain nuclear weapons. Alliances, economic and military assistance, and the fostering of better international relations—including confidence-building measures between rivals—can all contribute significantly to this sense of security.

In addition, the attitude of the weapon states toward the role of nuclear weapons in their own security can affect the motivation of nonweapon states with security problems. That is, if the nuclear powers react to international tensions by building more nuclear weapons, the connection between security and nuclear weapons is enhanced. On the other hand, the evident reluctance of weapon states to use nuclear weapons in military situations suggests that their usefulness is limited. The latter point is also made by agreements to reduce nuclear arms.

The risk of horizontal proliferation also depends on the technical capability of states to build nuclear weapons. That, in turn, depends on access to fissile material, either plutonium or highly enriched uranium. States that have access to an ongoing supply of such materials essentially have a nuclear arsenal within their grasp, even if they still face some difficult technical problems in the fabrication of bombs and triggering mechanisms. If uranium enrichment (which produces highly enriched uranium and requires no nuclear reactor) and reprocessing technology (which separates plutonium from spent nuclear fuel) become widespread, proliferation can no longer be controlled from the standpoint of technical capability. The problem, therefore, becomes more difficult. For this reason, the supplier nations, including West Germany and France, that formerly demonstrated an indifference to the problem by signing agreements to export reprocessing plants to such nations as Brazil, Pakistan, and South Korea, have since agreed to exercise restraint in transferring these sensitive nuclear technologies. (The Pakistan and South Korea agreements were subsequently cancelled.)

Unfortunately, this does not mean there is agreement to restrict the use of plutonium and highly enriched uranium (particularly the former) in the nuclear reactors of the future. Although a current worldwide glut of uranium and enrichment capacity has eliminated shortages of fuel for nuclear power plants, a number of industrialized and near-industrialized countries are pursuing research and development on a breeder reactor that operates on a uranium oxide-plutonium oxide fuel and can theoretically produce more plutonium than it consumes. Some of these countries are also interested in eventually operating their conventional nuclear reactors with such a mixed-oxide fuel. This threatens to create a "plutonium economy" in these countries putting tons of plutonium into the commercial sphere and raising the availability of plutonium by theft, black market purchase, or other illegal means. Furthermore, it legitimizes the commercial production and use of weapons material, thereby making it far more difficult to discern the true intent of other states seeking the same material. Because a nuclear bomb can be constructed using only a few kilograms of plutonium, it is not clear that any international safeguard system would be adequate to deal with such plutonium commercialization.

Although the United States can avoid using plutonium as a fuel in most circumstances, other nations are not as rich in alternatives. This raises an important policy issue: to what extent should the United States help other nations carry on research and development programs aimed at producing plutonium for breeders or for conventional reactors? The United States can currently control the reprocessing of U.S.-origin spent fuel outside of the countries belonging to Euratom, an organ of the European Economic Community, and seeks to extend its influence to the decisions of this European consortium as well. But for the United States to refuse to permit reprocessing in a country with good nonproliferation credentials, such as Japan, would provoke hostility, the loss of future fuel enrichment service contracts, and a decline in future U.S. influence over that country's nuclear program. However, for the United States to relax restrictions on reprocessing would be to risk accelerating the emergence of plutonium economies in other nations and to reduce our own national security.

Fortunately, the economics of the breeder reactor, reprocessing, and the recycling of plutonium into conventional reactors now appears to be quite unfavorable. All such programs—including that of the French, the leaders in the field—are being cut back. Hence, more time is available to consider alternatives to advanced nuclear technology and to improve safeguards. But if the alternatives fail, pressures may again increase for the widespread use of plutonium in power reactors. The United States must be prepared with policy contingencies if the existing safeguard system remains inadequate to the task.

III

In addition to horizontal proliferation, the problem of vertical proliferation continues; that is, stockpiles of weapons belonging to the nuclear powers are increasing. The United States and the Soviet Union together reportedly possess more than 50,000 nuclear warheads. At a time when arms control negotiations have broken down, proposals to develop newer and more modern weapons are being favorably received in both Washington and Moscow. This buildup is increasingly unacceptable to the nonweapon states, which insist that the nuclear powers live up to their obligations under Article VI of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, which calls for the nuclear weapon state to pursue genuine arms control agreements. Failure to pursue such agreements was a major issue at the 1980 NPT review conference and is quite likely to be so again at the 1985 conference.

Considerable time would be required, even under favorable diplomatic conditions, for the superpowers to negotiate a verifiable treaty involving significant nuclear arms reductions. This has motivated some proliferation experts to search for meaningful near-term arms control objectives that would have a beneficial impact on nonproliferation as well as on U.S.-Soviet relations. A comprehensive ban on nuclear weapons testing is one example of such a measure.

The main stumbling block to a comprehensive test ban in the past has been the issue of verifying compliance. Scientists disagree about the threshold at which underground nuclear explosions can be detected and whether explosions can be distinguished from seismic events, such as earthquakes. Many now believe that our instrumentation, which will surely improve, is sufficiently sensitive that a test ban would not pose significant risk to our national security. For its part, the Soviet Union has not rejected the possibility of permitting unmanned detection instruments on its territory. U.S. policymakers will have to decide whether the residual risks of signing a test ban treaty exceed the growing risk of failing to check the unraveling of the nonproliferation regime.

In addition to the comprehensive test ban, a verifiable agreement by the United States and the Soviet Union to halt or limit the production of separated fissile material (highly enriched uranium or plutonium) would also have a beneficial effect on the climate for both nuclear arms control and nonproliferation. Eventually, all the weapon states would have to join in such an agreement if it were to be fully effective.

IV

Although 121 countries have signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty, a significant number of nations still have not, including some that are known to be considering or actively pursuing a nuclear weapons program and others that are developing unsafeguarded nuclear facilities that could provide fissile material for a future weapons program.

Israel and South Africa reportedly have undeclared nuclear weapons or are producing weapons-grade material. India, which has exploded a fission device, is believed to be maintaining a stockpile of unsafeguarded plutonium and can add to this stockpile at will.

For several years, Pakistan has been engaged in a worldwide effort to purchase or otherwise acquire plans, components, equipment, and technology for the construction of a gas centrifuge nuclear enrichment plant to produce highly enriched uranium. (A.Q. Khan, head of Pakistan's nuclear enrichment project, was accused of stealing plans for a centrifuge facility from a Dutch company. He was convicted in absentia by a Dutch court.) Pakistan, with only one small nuclear power plant, has also built a reprocessing plant and is reportedly working on bomb-triggering mechanisms.

Argentina and Brazil have both been interested in developing capacities for reprocessing plutonium and for producing highly enriched uranium. Until its recent change of government, Argentina was well on its way to achieving this capability with indigenous, unsafeguarded facilities. The future plans of the Argentine government in this area are unclear. Brazil has an agreement with West Germany that provides for German export of facilities for the full fuel-cycle processing of nuclear fuels, both reprocessing and enrichment (under safeguard). Brazil is developing unsafeguarded facilities as well. Neither Argentina nor Brazil is presently committed to adhering to the Treaty of Tlatelolco, which entered into force in 1968 and is designed to create a nuclear-weapon-free zone in Latin America.

In addition to the above nonsignatory nations, some parties to the Non-Proliferation Treaty have engaged in nuclear activities that raise suspicions about their future intent. These nations include Iraq, Libya, Iran, South Korea, and Taiwan. Alarmed by Iraqi activities, the Israelis launched an air stike that destroyed a research reactor near Baghdad on June 7, 1981.

The common motives that link these countries are rivalry and insecurity. For example, India produces her "peaceful nuclear explosion" to deter China; Pakistan develops the bomb to deter India. South Africa and Israel may produce nuclear weapons to deter military assaults by hostile forces vastly superior in number; Arab countries such as Iraq and Libya want to counter any Israeli nuclear advantages. Argentina and Brazil vie for political supremacy in South America and may see nuclear weapons capability as enhancing their efforts. South Korea worries about North Korea military superiority and the possible removal of U.S. protection. Taiwan is concerned about its future as China grows in strength and influence.

American diplomacy and policy will have to be flexible in dealing with these diverse situations, and in most cases international cooperation, including coordinated diplomacy, will be required to prevent the present situation from worsening.

V

A review conference is held every five years to examine how the Non-Proliferation Treaty is working and to search for a consensus on ways to improve it. In addition, parties to the treaty are to decide in 1995 on whether or not to extend the treaty. The past two review conferences held in 1975 and 1980 were rancorous affairs, with some parties charging that the supplier states, especially the United States, had not lived up to their obligations under Article IV, which obligates the supplier states to share the benefits of nuclear technology. And, as mentioned earlier, several nations protested that the superpowers had failed to meet their obligations under Article VI to curb their own nuclear arms race.

The nuclear technology issue is exacerbated by the fact that some nations that are not parties to the Non-Proliferation Treaty receive more technical assistance from the IAEA than do parties to the treaty, and that only the United States, Canada, and Australia require all recipients of nuclear trade to satisfy essentially the same safeguard requirements as are required for NPT parties. Because other suppliers are not as meticulous in their trading practices, some NPT signatories have begun to question the value of their nonproliferation commitment. Some have even hinted that unless the supplier nations and the superpowers better fulfill their obligations under Articles IV and VI, some nations may defect from the treaty.

Should the NPT collapse in 1995 or before, a major toll for maintaining the international nonproliferation regime would be lost. On the other hand, as Iraq, Libya, Iran, South Korea, and Taiwan make amply clear, the PNT is not adequate to assure the nuclear suppliers that all signatory countries are sufficiently committed to nonproliferation to allow transfers of sensitive nuclear technology, even with safeguards. Straddling the line between supporting the NPT and strengthening nuclear export controls will require deft maneuvering by the United States and other supplier nations.

VI

The International Atomic Energy Agency has managed a difficult transition from an agency whose primary focus was the promotion of nuclear energy and technical assistance to an agency in which the safeguard function is no longer a subordinate activity. But difficulties remain and are growing. The agency has been greatly politicized during the past decade, with Israel and South Africa under periodic attack for reasons unrelated to their agency obligations. In 1982 the United States walked out of the organization for several months to protest a move to strip the Israelis of their credentials at the International Atomic Energy Agency General Conference that year because of Israel's attack on the Iraqi reactor. The Israeli issue has still not been resolved, and the IAEA General Conference of 1984 voted to postpone the issue of imposing sanctions against Israel for another year.

The agency's 156 inspectors are responsible for monitoring the whereabouts of some 48,000 tons of nuclear material worldwide (including 6.8 tons of separated plutonium and 11 tons of highly enriched uranium) at roughly 320 sites in more than 50 countries. Because of a shortage of qualified inspectors, the IAEA must husband its resources to ensure that the most sensitive facilities are properly safeguarded. (Of the IAEA's 1984 budget of $143 million, $37 million was allocated for safeguards.) In particular, bulk-handling facilities, through which highly enriched uranium and plutonium flow, require continuous monitoring by resident inspectors. In a sufficiently large plant, state-of-the-art measurement techniques do not allow the IAEA, on the basis of the measurements alone, to declare that diversions have not occurred; the limit of error on materials unaccounted for may still allow significant quantities of fissile material to escape without detection. To raise the level of confidence, an effective surveillance and detection system must be installed in addition to materials accounting and inspection activities.

Serious doubts exist as to whether the IAEA will ever have sufficient trained manpower to meet its own technical objectives for ensuring the early detection of a diversion of nuclear material. (As mentioned earlier, the IAEA has no police authority or ability to prevent diversion.) To raise its public credibility substantially, the agency would have to: (1) initiate unannounced inspections, (2) end the secrecy surrounding inspection results, (3) undertake closer observation of nuclear operations using both instruments and human monitors, and (4) refuse to allow inspected states an unlimited veto of chosen inspectors.

The Israeli raid on Iraq's safeguarded Tammuz I reactor was clearly a vote of no confidence in the safeguard system. In September 1980, Iraq temporarily evicted all French nuclear technicians working on the project, saying it could not guarantee their protection during the Iran-Iraq war. Then, in November, Iraq announced it was suspending IAEA inspection of its nuclear facilities until the war was over. Meanwhile, the Iraqi government was refusing a French request to substitute less highly enriched uranium for bomb-grade uranium in the reactor core. The Israeli air raid that destroyed the reactor was the first direct military action ever undertaken to prevent another country from furthering its nuclear weapons capability.

VII

Maintaining effective international nonproliferation norms requires a commitment by nuclear suppliers to a common set of standards. While some progress has occurred in recent years in extending the list of equipment and components that should carry safeguards when transferred, there is still significant disagreement among suppliers on such fundamental questions as whether nuclear trade should be allowed with nonweapon states that have unsafeguarded facilities. The French, in particular, believe that a requirement for comprehensive safeguards is too rigid, while other suppliers, notably the United States, argue that a strict policy enhances the political value of adherence to the treaty.

The problem of maintaining common supplier standards is likely to worsen as so-called "second-tier" suppliers enter the picture. India, China, South Africa, Argentina, Brazil, Spain, and Niger are all gearing up to compete in the world nuclear export market. Unfortunately, the commitment of some of these countries to a strong nonproliferation regime varies from weak to none. Finding ways to bring the export policies of second-tier suppliers into line with accepted practices (perhaps through joint ventures with first-tier suppliers that would preserve uniform standards) will require imaginative policies and persistent diplomacy.

The recently negotiated but unsigned agreement for cooperation between the United States and China warrants special mention. The agreement—whose language has not been made available to date—is currently in limbo while the United States attempts to clarify Chinese pledges not to help nations seeking nuclear assistance if there are proliferation implications. According to press reports, the Chinese may have cooperated with Pakistan in sharing nuclear information useful for weaponmaking. While the U.S.-China agreement and subsequent sales of equipment may help to induce China to share in strengthening the nonproliferation regime, the agreement must be completely unambiguous in terms of the responsibilities of the Chinese to satisfy the letter and the spirit of applicable U.S. legislation, especially the Nuclear Nonproliferation Act. Care must also be exercised that the agreement not be seen as unduly emphasizing the discriminatory nature of the nonproliferation regime. A nuclear agreement with another weapon state that contains overweak safeguards against using exported nuclear material or equipment for weapon purposes would be seen by many nations as another blow to their own commitment not to proliferate, particularly when one of the weapon states (China) has refused to sign the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

VIII

Far more ominous at this point is the prospect, in the near-to-intermediate term, of a nuclear arms race in South Asia and the Middle East. If the Pakistani nuclear program culminates in construction of a weapon—or, especially, a nuclear test explosion—it will be politically difficult for India to stand pat. Whether the initial Indian reaction would be to build a nuclear arsenal, match the test with another of its own, launch a preemptive military strike to knock out the offending nuclear facilities, or simply wait and see what the Pakistanis do next, a Pakistani bomb would have serious repercussions not only in South Asia but in the Middle East and elsewhere.

The United States has been wrestling with this problem for a decade. In 1976 Congress passed the Glenn/Symington amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act, an amendment that required cutting off economic and military assistance to countries engaged in certain nuclear trading practices and other behavior detrimental to nonproliferation. U.S. aid to Pakistan was ended in 1979 under this provision. It was restored in 1981 after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, with a provision that assistance must be suspended again in the event of a Pakistani nuclear test. Additional moves are being considered by Congress to make military assistance to Pakistan contingent on better nuclear behavior by that country.

As Pakistan moves closer to nuclear weapons capability, the United States will be faced with the dilemma of balancing its security interests in South Asia with its wider interest in nonproliferation. Continuing U.S. aid to Pakistan helps to ensure Pakistani cooperation in containing Soviet ambitions in South Asia, and it may give the United States some leverage over future Pakistani actions. However, it sends a poor signal to potential proliferators around the world as to the depth of the U.S. commitment to nonproliferation and, in particular, to the notion that violators of nonproliferation norms should be penalized. The United States must decide at what point its long-term security interests become more threatened by Pakistani nuclear activities than by possible Pakistani noncooperation on Afghanistan.

An equally delicate problem exists in the Middle East, where it is tacitly assumed that Israel has a nuclear capability, stemming from an unsafeguarded research reactor in the Negev that was delivered to Israel by France in 1961. Israel's nuclear program, coupled with the bitter hostility that marks relations among states in that region, has increased incentives for other Middle Eastern nations to acquire nuclear weapons. Shortly after seizing power in 1969, Libyan leader Colonel Muammar Quaddafi reportedly tried unsuccessfully to purchase an atomic bomb from China. He is rumored to have made similar efforts with other states.

Before the revolution that brought the Ayatollah Khomeini to power, the Shah of Iran launched an ambitious nuclear program that would have eventually given Iran a potential weapons capability. The program has since been suspended but could one day be revived. Considering the lack of restraint in the use of chemical weapons in the Iran-Iraq war, one shudders to think what might be happening in the Middle East today if those nations had nuclear weapons. The Israeli preemptive air strike against the Iraqi reactor and the violence of the Iran-Iraq conflict have induced greater caution on the part of nuclear suppliers. Nonetheless, the specter of a future nuclear arms race in the Middle East cannot be dismissed.

In both South Asia and the Middle East, there has been occasional talk of negotiating a nuclear-weapon-free zone, but the prospect of accomplishing such a goal outside the context of a general political settlement does not seem promising. The participants in any proposed nuclear-weapon-free zone tend to demand the inclusion of an excessive number of neighboring states.

IX

The balance sheet on nonproliferation is not encouraging. Although the number of declared nuclear weapon states has remained constant for nearly 20 years, at least 10 nations have moved close to an overt nuclear capability. These nations have built an undeclared stockpile of weapons, constructed or are constructing unsafeguarded facilities to produce fissile material, have an interest in weapons development, or have sought nuclear technology incompatible with a cost-effective program of power generation but compatible with development of a future weapons program. Some of these nations have signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty, but most have not, indicating in both cases that it is futile to rely on the NPT alone for protection against proliferation.

Current international agreements on nuclear trade do not rule out transfers of sensitive technology that are difficult to safeguard. Moreover, the international agency responsible for the safeguard function is becoming increasingly politicized.

Although fine in theory, nuclear-weapon free zones are difficult to achieve. The most successful attempt—the Treaty of Tlatelolco—is still far from being accepted by the Latin American nations whose endorsement is most needed, namely Cuba, Argentina, and Brazil.

Conceivably, in the next decade we could see open or clandestine nuclear arms races in South Asia and the Middle East, while adherence to the NPT suffers further erosion.

And finally, the superpowers still broadcast a message that equates national security with more nuclear weapons and new technologies promise to make the future production of fissile material easier, less expensive, and more widespread.

On the other side of the ledger, the limited utility of nuclear weapons is now better understood, and greater sensitivity to proliferation exists now than ever before. Nuclear suppliers are more cooperative in enforcing safeguards than they have been in the past, and pressure on the weapon states to reduce their arsenals is growing. In addition, a combination of energy conservation, alternative technologies, and excess oil supplies has dimmed the attractiveness of technologies that pose a high proliferation risk, such as the breeder reactor and the recycling of plutonium for use in conventional reactors.

Despite these gains, ominous prospects demand that the prevention and control of nuclear proliferation remain among the highest priorities of the United States.

SEGAL'S MEMORIAL

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on November 9 of last year, the Capital Times of Madison, WI, described a new monument to the victims of the Holocaust and its dedication ceremonies. The monument is located in San Francisco. It depicts a pile of dead victims of the Holocaust with a solitary survivor looking out from his barbed-wire confinement.

As the Capital Times article notes, the monument rouses haunting images of that terror which occurred some 40 years ago. George Segal created the monument. He stated that he intended to make the piece a memorial to all of those who have had the misfortune of experiencing mankind's "dark underside."

That "dark underside" which Segal mentions has appeared numerous times. Not only the Jews, but the Cambodians, Armenians, and other groups have been victims of it.

As a response to the displays of this "dark underside" of man, the United States has become a leader in fighting for human rights. As part of our response, we were a leader in the drafting of the Genocide Convention.

But our reply to mankind's "dark underside" as demonstrated by the Holocaust continues to be incomplete. We have not ratified the convention which we were instrumental in creating. We have not done all that we can to fight for the basic rights of our fellow man.

Yet our need to fight continues. From reports around the world we still see real occurrences of what George Segal's monument depicts—a group of victims, some unable to struggle anymore, some peering out from behind the barrier which encloses them in their oppression, torture, or even deadly environment. Many of the oppressed flee to this country, but many, like Segal's survivor, cannot flee.

Certainly, ratification of the Genocide Convention would not give us the ability to right all of the world's wrongs, but it would be one step in reaffirming our commitment to the basic rights of others. We should make this step as soon as we can.

At the end of the last session of Congress, the Senate passed a resolution expressing its commitment to consider the Genocide Convention early this year. It is time for us to make good on that commitment and finally ratify the treaty.

KENTUCKY GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTIONS REGARDING TOBACCO IMPORTS AND FUNDING FOR THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, during the recent organizational session of the Kentucky General Assembly, two resolutions were passed by the house of representatives regarding tobacco imports and funding for the Tennessee Valley Authority.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION NO. 7

A resolution requesting the President to reduce tobacco imports to expeditiously bring the excessive tobacco loan stocks in the pool under control, with 50 million pounds being the maximum carryover

Whereas, imports of burley tobacco have increased about 290 percent since 1975; and

Whereas, imports of tobacco unnecessarily increase the cost of the no net cost program, at the expense of the American tobacco farmer; and

Whereas, American tobacco farmers have production controls while foreign producers do not, an unfair advantage for the foreign producer; and

Whereas, tobacco is the lifeblood of Kentucky agriculture, accounting for about 50 percent of the State's total crop receipts; and

Whereas, about 76 percent of Kentucky's tobacco farmers have a net annual farm income of less than $10,000; and

Whereas, imports of burley tobacco have contributed to the increase of burley pool tobacco from zero pounds in 1981 to about 307,000,000 pounds as of January 1, 1985, not including the large amount of the 1984 burley crop going to the pool; and

Whereas, tobacco imports should not be allowed from those countries which do not allow American tobacco into their countries; and

Whereas, tobacco imports should not be allowed from those countries or manufacturers which subsidize the production or manufacturing of tobacco; and

Whereas, imported tobacco should not be allowed which does not meet the same pesticide and herbicide requirements which American-produced tobacco must meet; and

Whereas, imported tobacco should be charged a single rate of duty for each pound, regardless of the classification; and

Whereas, imported tobacco should not be allowed from nations whose human rights posture precludes a fair wage for a person's effort; and

Whereas, imported tobacco should not be allowed from nations who do not allow a fair and just market for American products; and

Whereas, imported tobacco should not be allowed from nations which do not require adequate labeling information regarding the use of pesticides and herbicides because of the risk to uninformed workers when exposed to harmful chemicals: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky:

Section 1. That the President take the immediate necessary legal action under Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act (7 USCA Section 624), as amended, to reduce tobacco imports because they ". . . render or tend to render ineffective, or materially interfere with . . ." the tobacco price support program. It is recommended that tobacco imports be reduced to expeditiously bring the excessive tobacco loan stocks in the pool under control. Fifty million pounds of tobacco carryover in the pool is the maximum level objective.

Section 2. That copies of this resolution be sent to the President, Madam Chairman of the U.S. International Trade Commission, U.S. Secretary of Agriculture, Kentucky's Congressional delegation, and Kentucky Commissioner of Agriculture.

HOUSE RESOLUTION NO. 10

A resolution urging President Ronald Reagan to reject the recommendation of David Stockman, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, that the budget for the Tennessee Valley Authority be reduced from 135 million dollars to 38 million dollars

Whereas, the reduction in the TVA budget represents a savings of 97 million dollars within the context of the federal budget, yet in reality a budget cut of such magnitude is no savings at all because this budget cutting would eliminate TVA programs which are the seedbed for millions of dollars being produced within the private sector; and

Whereas, one example of such a phantom savings would occur should the 7½ million dollar TVA program for management of the Land Between The Lakes in Western Kentucky be eliminated; and

Whereas, funding for the Land Between The Lakes generates a large portion of the private sector dollars for the Western Kentucky counties of Graves, McCracken, Calloway, Marshall, Livingston, Crittenden, Lyon, Caldwell, Trigg, and Christian, the adverse impact from the loss of the 7½ million dollars for the Land Between The Lakes will be greatly disproportionate to the savings made in the federal budget; and

Whereas, the TVA management of the Land Between The Lakes attracts 2,100,000 tourists annually, directly employs three-hundred individuals, creates 1800 jobs within the region, maintains the natural resources where hunters and fishermen spent 6.8 million dollars in 1984 and where photographers and others spent 2.8 million dollars in 1984, and lastly, provides a focal point for a 150 million dollar tourist industry extending for a 200 mile radius beyond the Land Between The Lakes; and

Whereas, the economic life created within the region by the TVA funding for the Land Between The Lakes has even greater importance when it is realized that the major industry of Western Kentucky has slumped since 1970 when the western coal fields produced 52 million tons of coal but in 1983 only produced 34 million tons: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky:

Section 1. That the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Kentucky urges President Ronald Reagan to reject the recommendation that the budget of the Tennessee Valley Authority be reduced from 135 million dollars to 38 million dollars because the elimination of the 7½ million dollar program for the Land Between The Lakes in Western Kentucky will ultimately be more costly to the federal government than funding the program.

Section 2. That this resolution be sent to President Ronald Reagan, Director David Stockman, and the members of the Kentucky Congressional Delegation.

SOVIET JEWRY

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to initiate the 1985 Congressional Call to Conscience. This is a congressional effort to draw attention to the problem of Jews and others living in the shadow of oppression in the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Union is the nation with the third largest Jewish community. It has, with historical continuity, violated the rights of those Jews, and others as well. It is a state that refuses to allow Jews to live in their owner country with dignity and with the freedom to be Jews, and yet denies them the right to emigrate to fulfill these rights.

As you know, despite international human rights agreements—most notably the Helsinki accords—which guarantee an individual's rights to freedom of religion, cultural practices and emigration, the situation in the Soviet Union has worsened.

The closing of synagogues, banning of Hebrew language instruction, the pervasive discrimination in education, employment and social life, and the confiscation of prayer books are all a part of a sinister state policy to destroy Jewish culture.

Yet, as the Kremlin denies anti-Semitism, it continues its harsh policy of keeping its exit gates shut and keeping these Jews caged within their own country. In 1984, fewer than 1,000 Soviet Jews were allowed to emigrate. This is the lowest level in over a decade.

With emigration in its abyss and with the Soviet authorities accelerating their harassment of Jewish activists, this Congressional Call to Conscience is extremely essential to the morale and cultural survival of the Jewish minority trapped within the Soviet Union. We must emphasize to the Soviets at every opportunity that we consider the issue of human rights, including the emigration of Soviet Jews and others, of great importance in evaluating our overall relations with them.

It is critical that each of us in our own way let the citizens of the Soviet Union know that we care and that we have not abandoned and will never abandon their cause. We must continuously denounce the forced surrender of basic human rights to the arbitrary will of a repressive government. It is crucial that we do not lessen our efforts on their behalf, even if other momentous events temporarily overshadow the suffering of Soviet Jewry and others in the Soviet Union.

Recently, I contacted President Chernenko on behalf of Soviet refusniks, Vladimir and Maria Slepak, and urged his immediate attention and appeal to their behalf.

Vladimir, Maria, and their son first applied for exit visas in April 1970. They were refused 2 months later because of Vladimir's "classified" work as head of a laboratory in the Moscow Scientific Institute of Television Research. Although he had left his position a year earlier, hoping that this step would facilitate his visa, Maria's and his applications were turned down because of Vladimir's "state interest."

Eight years later, Maria and Vladimir Slepak were arrested for displaying a banner from their home window saying "Let us Go to Our Son in Israel." As a result, Vladimir was sentenced to 5 years of internal exile on charges of "malicious hooliganism," and Maria was given a 3-year suspended sentence.

Vladimir was released from Siberia in 1981 and permitted into Moscow where he currently works as an elevator operator. Both he and Maria reapplied for exit visas to Israel this past summer, 14 years after the original exit visas were applied for, but were once again refused.

As we begin this Congressional Call to Conscience, let us band together to voice congressional concern about those who have repeatedly been denied the right to practice their religion freely and the right to emigrate. There are unfortunately thousands of refusniks, not only Jews but many others as well, like Maria and Vladimir Slepak who so desperately yearn for freedom.

It is the obligation of all of us in the free world to call for a stop to this tyranny of Soviet authority.

Mr. President, I yield to the floor.

Mr. SIMPSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, let me say that I very much appreciate the remarks of my friend from Minnesota, Senator BOSCHWITZ. I worked very closely with him on the issue of Soviet Jewry. There is no more conscientious legislator with whom I have come to work. He and I came to this Chamber at the same time. He still, of course, is one in rank ahead of me, and continually makes reference to it. I see he is gone. Yes.

RECOGNITION OF NEW COLLEAGUES

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I want to recognize the presence of three new colleagues who are here to observe the Senate procedures on this opening day—Senators PAUL SIMON, JAY ROCKEFELLER, and JOHN KERRY. I appreciate their attention to the extraordinary history of this Chamber, and it is the way to learn of it; that is, to be here, to observe it, even in these rather slack times, as Senator BOSCHWITZ, I, and the occupant of the chair, Senator GORTON, have done—to observe it, to learn it, and of course learn to love it. And it works best that way.

I commend you for that. Indeed, I do.

MEASURES PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I believe we have resolutions, or proposals, to be made at this time to which the leadership must respond.

S. 46—A BILL TO PROTECT THE LIVES OF UNBORN HUMAN BEINGS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The assistant majority leader is correct. The clerk will read for the second time any bill which has been received and which has remained at the desk pending second reading.

The first bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

S. 46, a bill to protect the lives of unborn human beings.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I object to further consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection, having been heard to further proceedings of the bill at this time, the bill will be placed on the calendar.

S. 47—A BILL TO RESTORE THE RIGHT OF VOLUNTARY PRAYER IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS AND TO PROMOTE THE SEPARATION OF POWERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the next bill.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 47) to restore the right of voluntary prayer in public schools and to promote the separation of powers.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I object to the further consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection, having been heard to further proceedings of this bill at this time, the bill will be placed on the calendar.

S. 49—A BILL PROTECTING FIREARMS OWNERS' CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS, CIVIL LIBERTIES, AND RIGHTS TO PRIVACY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the next bill.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

S. 49, a bill to protect the firearm owners' constitutional rights, civil liberties, and rights to privacy.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I object to further consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection having been heard to further proceedings on this bill at this time, the bill will be placed on the calendar.

JOINT REFERRAL OF NOMINATION OF RICHARD L. FRANCIS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the nomination of Richard L. Francis, of Virginia, to be President of the Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank, be jointly referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, and the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

I indicate that this request has been cleared by the minority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE INAUGURATION CEREMONY

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I understand we may have another resolution in a moment. Without suggesting the absence of a quorum at this moment, let me briefly reflect on and thank Senators MATHIAS and FORD for the remarkable effort they made in presenting this country with an extraordinarily moving and powerful inauguration ceremony under extraordinary conditions. I think not one of us who were actually there participating and the millions of Americans observing could not have felt the power of that ceremony in that very extraordinary rotunda of the Capitol. Certainly Senators MATHIAS and FORD must be very proud of their efforts as they dealt with the situation in a very, very skilled way. It is regrettable, indeed, that many thousands were unable to participate and observe the ceremony on the west front of the Capitol, as we were privileged to do 4 years ago for the first time, I believe, in history.

From this vista, as the Sun sets this evening, it is a beautiful sight. It is regrettable that we could not have held it there, but perhaps some would not have been able to get through it. I speak as one from Wyoming who is of rather hardy stature, and it was a sharp, bitter day and best that alternate plans were made.

I do hope that our future legislature activities will be as crisp and bright as our day and our relationships with our colleagues on the other side of the Capitol will be much more thawed. I hope that we may work closely with the Democratic majority in the House. I pledge to do that. I pledge that to my peers on the other side of the aisle and on the other side of the Capitol.

I think also of the President's remarks. I read import into the relationships he described between Jefferson and Adams, who lived in enmity and hostility toward each other, yet they made their peace. I think that is very important, and I would hope that our President and the Speaker of the House will have that same type of accord because there are those of us who know them as both warm, remarkable men of good humor in their singular capacities. Let us let the rest of the American people see them doing that in their joint and several capacities. I hope we will see that. It will be a great pleasure to work with this President. Yet all Presidents and all Governors at this time of year—and I see former Governor ROCKEFELLER—tremble as the legislature gathers to do its work.

My father was a Governor, and he used to say, as the legislature would come to Cheyenne in January, "My Lord, I feel like a toothless tiger." Indeed, that was often the case because it is our job to produce on the budget, not the Governor. It is our job to produce on this budget and not the President. So I look forward to working with this remarkable President. I look forward to serving him and I am delighted in the special privilege of participating in this day.

We are waiting clearance from the other side of the aisle, and apparently that has not yet been obtained so I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE GILLIS LONG OF LOUISIANA

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it be stated by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 39

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Gillis Long, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit an enrolled copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That when the Senate recesses today, it recess as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative.

Without objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 39) was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senators be appointed in accordance with the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, pursuant to the resolution just agreed to, appoints the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. LONG and Mr. JOHNSTON] as the committee on the part of the Senate to join the committee on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

ANNUAL HIGHWAY SAFETY AND NATIONAL TRAFFIC AND MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY REPORTS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT—PM 10

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on January 15, 1985, during the adjournment of the Senate, received the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

To the Congress of the United States:

The Highway Safety Act and the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act, both enacted in 1966, initiated a national effort to reduce traffic deaths and injuries and require annual reports on the administration of the Acts. This is the 16th year that these reports have been prepared for your review.

The report on motor vehicle safety includes the annual reporting requirement in Title I of the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act of 1972 (bumper standards). An annual report also is required by the Energy Policy and Conservation Act of 1975, which amended the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act and directed the Secretary of Transportation to set, adjust, and enforce motor vehicle fuel economy standards. Similar reporting requirements are contained in the Department of Energy Act of 1978 with respect to the use of advanced technology by the automobile industry. These requirements have been met in the Seventh Annual Fuel Economy Report, the highlights of which are summarized in the motor vehicle safety report.

In the Highway Safety Acts of 1973, 1976, and 1978, the Congress expressed its special interest in certain aspects of traffic safety, which are addressed in the volume on highway safety.

For the second year in a row, traffic fatalities have dropped significantly. The 43,945 fatalities recorded in 1982, while still unacceptably high and a tragedy to the Nation both in terms of lives lost and the economic consequences of the deaths, represent an 11 percent decrease from the preceding year.

In addition, despite large increases in drivers, vehicles, and traffic, the Federal standards and programs for motor vehicle and highway safety instituted since 1966 have contributed to a significant reduction in the fatality rate per 100 million miles of travel. The rate has decreased from 5.5 in the mid-60's to the 1982 level of 2.76. This means that motorists can drive more miles today with less risk. If the 1966 fatality rate had been experienced in 1982, more than 87,586 persons would have lost their lives in traffic accidents.

Achieving even greater reductions in the annual traffic death toll will not be easy, but it is a challenge we readily accept and intend to actively pursue. Motorists today are better informed and driving in safer vehicles and on safer roads. But they are still victims of habit and of human nature. They choose not to wear safety belts because they do not expect to be in an accident. They drive after drinking too much, because alcohol is part of our social mores. And they sometimes speed and take unnecessary chances, because being in a hurry is an unfortunate fact of modern life. Changing these ingrained behaviors is the traditional and most challenging obstacle to improving traffic safety.

The answer lies in widespread public education efforts, and a continuing national traffic safety commitment that involves government, the private sector, and the individual motorist. We will also consider new regulations, but only when there is no practical alternative, and when we are certain that doing so will result in a clear and beneficial improvement in safety.

While we can be justifiably proud of the accomplishments to date, we are convinced that this approach will bring about even more progress, and that American motorists and pedestrians will ultimately enjoy a greater level of personal safety as a result.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. GOLDWATER:

S. 195. REPEAL TO FOREIGN INVESTMENT IN REAL PROPERTY TAX ACT OF 1980

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am today reintroducing legislation to repeal FIRPTA, the Foreign Investment in Real Property Tax Act of 1980.

Mr. President, FIRPTA levies a discriminatory tax burden against foreign investors who sell real property holdings in the United States. As originally introduced 5 years ago, the provision was a very limited one aimed at preventing foreign takeovers of farm production land. However, the original concept was changed at the urging of the Treasury Department so that the final version became an all inclusive reporting and capital gains tax applicable to foreign investment in real estate of all kinds. Today, FIRPTA is so sweeping it not only applies to direct investment in U.S. real estate, but to oil and gas leases and to stock interests in any U.S. manufacturing or production firm in which a foreign investor holds more than 5 percent of the company stock.

The result has been a law that strongly discourages needed investment which might otherwise have increased the competitiveness of domestic corporations and created more U.S. jobs. FIRPTA is harming the U.S. economy and serving no useful purpose.

The Tax Reform Act of 1984 compounded the problem by imposing withholding on transactions occurring after January 1, 1985. Withholding will supposedly replace reporting requirements, but the 1984 statute authorizes the Department of the Treasury to continue reporting requirements on a very broad range of investments in its discretion. Withholding does nothing for the economy of individual American States which are dependent upon a favorable investment climate.

Mr. President, there can be no doubt that FIRPTA will stifle investment. Two European witnesses, who appeared at the hearing on FIRPTA by the Finance Committee last June 19, testified that uncertainty created by FIRPTA has seriously dampened direct investment in U.S. real property and will continue to deter such investment unless the law is repealed. Unlike tax theorists who have absolutely no knowledge of large foreign investment firms, these witnesses represented enormous investment trust companies. Lord Mark Fitzalan Howard appeared on behalf of the British Association of Investment Trust Companies, whose member firms hold assets of $20 billion, and Senator Van Tets of the Dutch Parliament appeared on behalf of the European Federation for Retirement Provision, a federation of the national association of pension funds in eight European countries. Each testified that uncertainty created by FIRPTA is causing foreign investors to cut back on a wide range of investments in the United States. American tax experts who testified at the June 19 hearing indicated that the real cost of administering FIRPTA will far exceed any revenue to be received from it and that instead of creating "parity" among domestic and foreign investors, FIRPTA places the foreign investor in U.S. real estate in a disadvantaged position.

Dr. Jimmye Hillman, chairman of the department of agricultural economics at the University of Arizona, testified that FIRPTA has actually been detrimental to the farm community which it was originally designed to assist. What is not generally known is that if foreign investors make any income on their holdings, they are taxed at 30 percent of gross income. Unlike American citizens, foreign persons cannot deduct property taxes paid on the land. Nor can they deduct interest charges on any financial arrangements made to buy the land. Also, numerous tax benefits, such as accelerated depreciation and investment tax credits, that U.S. citizens may utilize, are not available to foreign investors.

Farmers who are suffering depressed land values would welcome foreign investment. Where is it, they ask.

From a wealth of new government data available on the subject, we can now see clearly that the emotional fears expressed about possible foreign domination of American farmland was based on a myth. Foreign ownership of American crop, grazing and other production land is and has been miniscule, representating less than 1 percent of all privately held agricultural land in the United States. If any law is needed to limit foreign ownership of agricultural lands in local situations, the tax code is the wrong vehicle for that purpose. The right of each sovereign State to restrict land ownership by aliens is deeply imbedded in American law.

To sum up, Mr. President, FIRPTA is contrary to our national interest and serves no reasonable purpose. Foreign investors are helping speed along the healthy economic recovery our Nation is enjoying. While foreign governments are doing everything possible to attract investment, the United States is discouraging it. In light of our present need to finance massive Government deficits, we would be foolish not to join those nations of the world which are going to great lengths to win in foreign investment. Reducing barriers which discourage access to the U.S. capital market is a better way of encouraging these investments than maintaining high interest rates.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S. 196. A bill to repeal section 212(a)(4) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDING SECTION 212(A)(4) OF THE IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY ACT

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the legislation I'm introducing today will strike from the Immigration and Nationality Act provisions that require the Immigration and Naturalization Service [INS] to deny admission into the United States to aliens suspected of being homosexuals.

Specifically, section 212(a)(4) of the Immigration and Nationality Act presently provides for exclusion of "aliens afflicted with psychopathic personality, sexual deviation, or mental defect."

This provision of the law was first enacted in 1952 as part of the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act. As originally written, the statute applied to "aliens afflicted with psychopathic personality, epilepsy, or a mental defect."

In 1965 the words "sexual deviation" were substituted for "epilepsy."

In other words, the 1965 amendment established legislatively that homosexuality was a specific example of an affliction requiring an examination of the person by the Public Health Service [PHS] and certification that the disease or mental defect was not present before an applicant could be admitted to the United States.

In 1973, the American Psychiatric Association formally declared that, in its view, homosexuality per se is not a mental disorder. And, in 1979, the Surgeon General of the United States announced that the PHS would no longer consider homosexuality a disease or mental defect under the statute. The Surgeon General also advised INS officers that PHS would no longer make a medical examination of aliens referred by INS because of suspected homosexuality. While this denied INS medical confirmation of its agents' suspicions, it did not change the underlying law on which INS agents are acting.

The practical result is that an inexpert immigration officer, acting alone, can now determine arbitrarily that an arriving alien is to be denied entry solely on the grounds of the officer's suspicions that the alien is a homosexual. Meanwhile, other immigration officers may admit closet homosexuals whom they fail to suspect of homosexuality. Such inconsistent enforcement discriminates against the openly homosexual person and those who appear homosexual even though they may not be, and may regard those who choose to hide their homosexuality. It punishes self-respect, honesty, and openness.

The root of the problem, however, goes beyond the arbitrary enforcement which results. It lies in the unwise and harshly discriminatory underlying law, which attempts to use private sexual orientation as a criterion for judging who does and who does not qualify for admission to the United States, either as a visitor or as a resident alien.

In 1979, I sponsored private legislation to permit a visa to be issued to a Filipino woman who had been denied an opportunity to join her family here solely because she is a lesbian. Each succeeding Congress since, I've sponsored legislation to repeal section 212(a)(4). In the 98th Congress, I introduced S. 2210, which was identical to the bill I'm now introducing.

This legislation will delete the objectionable language from section 212(a)(4) of the Immigration and Nationality Act and substitute new language excluding aliens afflicted with true mental disease or defect. This bill is intended to make clear that sexual orientation alone cannot be the ground for denying entry to aliens wishing to visit or seeking to immigrate to the United States.

Adoption of this legislation will end a form of discrimination which has no valid scientific or medical basis and which violates traditional American respect for the privacy and dignity of an individual.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed at the conclusion of my remarks:

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 196

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraph (4) of section 212(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, as amended, is hereby repealed.

S. 198. A bill for the relief of Li Cunxin; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF LI CUNXIN

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce legislation for Li Cunxin, a U.S. resident alien, for the purpose of expediting the time required for Li to obtain U.S. naturalized citizenship. Li, the Chinese premier dancer of the Houston Ballet, hopes to further his growing reputation and that of his company by representing the United States at the international ballet competition in Moscow in June 1985.

In order for Li to compete in Moscow, he the must be a U.S. citizen. As such, he must not only be a person of good moral character, but he must have resided in the United States as a lawful permanent resident for at least 5 years, as provided under section 316 of the Immigration and Nationality Act. As Li has only resided for approximately 3 years and 4 months, as a U.S. resident alien, it would not be legally possible for Li to file for U.S. citizenship until August 1986. Accordingly, the only way upon which Li may achieve U.S. citizenship and represent the United States in Moscow in June 1985 is for him to be exempt from the full 5 year residency requirement.

This legislation would speed up the process already underway. Although Li has lived continuously in the United States since November 1979, he did not obtain permanent residence status until the summer of 1981. Thus the magic date for U.S. citizenship does not come until August 1986. I believe that this legislation will benefit not only Li, personally, but both Houston and the United States as a whole. Our country, long described as a melting pot for many cultures and national origins, has already extended the privilege of obtaining citizenship to Li. This legislation will speed up this process for obtaining U.S. citizenship and provide Li with the opportunity to represent his new country, America, at the international ballet competition in Moscow this June.●

S. 199. A bill for the relief of Pedro Narvaez-Guajardo and Rosario Bernal de Narvaez; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF PEDRO NARVAEZ-GUAJARDO AND ROSARIO BERNAL DE NARVAEZ

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, today, I am reintroducing a bill on behalf of Pedro and Rosario Narvaez of San Antonio. I have been moved by the exceptional circumstances of the Narvaez family which warrants legislative action.

The Narvaez couple entered the United States illegally 18 years ago. Since that time they have worked to support themselves and their children (most of whom were born in the United States) in their own successful painting/contracting company. Their older children are permanent residents while their minor children, of course are U.S. citizens by birth. The irony which exists is that these two elderly parents, if deported, would be separated from their children, the very individuals whose lives they struggled to enrich by coming to the United States.

The Narvaez's company has from 12-16 full time employees. The Narvaez family has contributed regularly to Social Security and have always paid their Federal income taxes. There has never existed any doubt as to the outstanding moral character of Pedro and Rosario Narvaez. Nevertheless, the Immigration and Naturalization Service has refused to consider anything other than their illegal entry into this country 18 years ago.

The Narvaez couple has exhausted all of their administrative remedies and will be subject to deportation unless this private relief bill is successfully passed. I believe that this legislation in not only just but morally correct.●

S. 200. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow individuals to compute the amount of the deduction for retirement savings on the basis of the compensation of the spouse; to the Committee on Finance.

HOMEMAKER'S EQUITY ACT

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, homemakers, like the self-employed and those whose jobs do not offer a retirement plan, deserve the opportunity to provide for financial security in old age. Acknowledging this, I am introducing legislation which recognizes the important economic value of our Nation's homemakers by making nonworking spouses eligible for the full $2,000 retirement deduction from taxable income that workers may receive.

Under current law, wage earners may receive a tax deferral on income they deposit in an individual retirement account up to $2,000 per year. This limit is increased to $2,250 if the wage earner is married and his spouse does not have an IRA. I do not believe that this situation is fair to homemakers who have not worked outside the home or who have interrupted their careers temporarily. My bill would permit a wage earner and his spouse to set aside increasing amounts in an IRA to provide for their retirement. The current $2,250 limit would be increased according to the following schedule:

For taxable years beginning in:	The applicable amount is:
1985 and 1986	$2,750
1987 and 1988	3,250
1989 and 1990	3,750
1991 and thereafter	4,000

When fully implemented in 1991, my bill would permit an annual contribution of up to $2,000 each by the homemaker and working spouse, for a maximum contribution of $4,000. In addition, my bill would permit the homemaker to establish an IRA and contribute $2,000 to it annually whether or not the wage earner has one. Although I would prefer increasing the limit to $4,000 immediately, I am phasing the increase in over a 7-year period of deference to revenue considerations.

Mr. President, financial security in retirement will become increasingly difficult to achieve in the years to come. By the turn of the century, 13 percent of our population will be over 65. Older persons are living longer, retiring earlier, and becoming increasingly dependent on retirement income programs. At the same time, the declining birth rate will mean fewer workers supporting more beneficiaries in the Social Security system.

In 1935, there were nine workers for every senior citizen. By 1977, that ratio had fallen to 4-to-1, and there were three workers for every Social Security beneficiary. It is estimated that by the year 2050, there will be two workers for every beneficiary. It is easy to see that our retirement system cannot take that kind of overload. One way to ease the burden on the system is to enable and encourage a person to provide for his or her own retirement. It was in this spirit that Congress adopted the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974. As my colleagues are no doubt aware, the legislation contained provisions which permitted individuals not participating in qualified private or governmental retirement programs to set up their own retirement plans. It's about time that homemakers were given equal treatment under ERISA. Though they do not work for wages, our Nation's homemakers do very real work with very long hours. We must recognize the economic value of their labor. My bill will enable this important group of individuals with no current means of providing for their retirement to do so—the 30 to 50 million American homemakers rapidly approaching retirement age without any type of retirement plan.

Mr. President, I have long argued that our present tax system is biased against savings. We need to constantly be looking for ways to encourage savings which, in turn, provide a greater pool of capital for the investment needed to promote economic growth. This simple and equitable IRA extension is one such option.

I was pleased that the Senate approved this legislation last year as a part of the Deficit Reduction Act. However, the provision was dropped during conference committee deliberations on the tax bill. This recent legislative history, coupled with the administration's support for the concept make me believe that we can adopt this bill quickly.

Mr. President, colleagues, I respectfully request your consideration of the Homemakers' Equity Act, legislation which will encourage individuals to take independent action to establish their own retirement funds, thus providing them with the means to live their later years with the dignity and self-respect which is rightfully theirs.●

By Mr. FORD:

S. 201. A bill amending title 49 of the United States Code with respect to standards for rail rates and determinations of rail carrier market dominance, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

REFORM OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION PRACTICES WITH RESPECT TO CAPTIVE SHIPPERS

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, during the 98th Congress, I introduced legislation to reform the Interstate Commerce Commission rate practices, especially in the area of captive shippers. I am today reintroducing this legislation with slight modifications. This legislation is still needed because of the irresponsible manner in which the ICC continues to implement provisions of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-448).

During debate of the Staggers Act, many Members of the Senate worked to strike a balance between the revenue interests of the railroads with those of coal and other captive shippers by retaining an appropriate degree of rate regulation. The intent of Congress has been ignored by the ICC. Contrary to the design and intent of the Staggers Act, it is apparent that the ICC believes the responsibility of improving the financial health of the railroads should be carried largely by the No. 1 commodity—coal. Coal is the leading commodity carried by the railroads, amounting to 40 percent of all freight tonnage. Many coal shippers, especially in my State, are captive to one railroad.

In a number of proceedings, the ICC has undermined the meaning of market dominance, sanctioned a 15-percent per year increase above inflation on coal movements despite the fact that Congress provided in the Staggers Act for inflation-based increases and a zone of rate flexibility which allows an additional 6 percent per year increase, has determined that captive movements may be made to pay for other less profitable traffic carried by the railroads and exempted export coal from any regulation. These proceedings were not required by the Staggers Act, but rather reflective of the general attitude of the present Commissioners on the ICC.

In September 1984, the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington overturned the ICC ruling that allowed railroads that ship coal for export to set rates without Government regulation. In a unanimous decision, the court said that the protections Congress meant to guarantee shippers were ignored by the ICC.

On October 9, 1984, I joined with 17 of my colleagues in a letter advising the Chairman of the ICC that it is very possible that Congress reexamine the implementation of the Staggers Act. It is time to clarify what exactly is meant by market dominance, provide commonsense business standards for determining revenue adequacy and provide additional guidance in developing standards for rail rates.

I understand the ICC has initiated a proceeding, ex parte No. 456, to gather and analyze, with the assistance of shippers and carriers, the Staggers Act. The method used by the ICC in this proceeding was the formation of voluntary conference groups and the use of concensus with those groups. I have been advised by several groups participating in this proceeding that if the ICC is seeking to use this investigation as a means of indicating public support for an unchanged Staggers Act and public approval of the ICC administration of that act in all respects, then the results would be unacceptable.

The October 9, 1984, letter also advised the Chairman that the 18 Members of the Senate would not await the conclusion of ex parte No. 456 to commence legislative actions. I have waited for 5 years for the ICC to implement the Long-Cannon amendment so I see no reason to await the outcome of ex parte No. 456. The bill that I am introducing today will not answer all the needs of shippers, but I believe that it is a good starting point and hopefully will stimulate legislative action in the Senate Commerce Committee.

The bill would establish three basic tests in the determination of market dominance for the ICC to investigate a rate:

First, establishment of a revenue-to-variable cost ratio as the threshold for ICC jurisdiction over rail rates contained in the Staggers Act;

Second, consideration of whether a shipper has substantial investment in railroad related plant and equipment; and

Third, whether 70 percent or more of a specific movement was handled by the rail carrier.

The last two tests were used by the ICC prior to the latest market dominance proceeding.

The bill provides guidance to the Commission in determining revenue adequacy by requiring the use of standard depreciation accounting and ratios indicative of financial health such as return on investment and bond ratings.

The bill also contains standards for determining whether rail rates are reasonable. The ICC would have to consider the relationship of the rate to the cost of the railroad of providing the service and whether the traffic involved is being required to pay an unreasonable share of the carrier's fixed cost.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 201

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 10101a(1) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by striking out "and the demand for services" and inserting in lieu thereof "among carriers to provide transportation services".

(b) Section 10101a(6) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(6) to maintain reasonable rates where there is an absence of effective competition as defined in section 10709(a);" SEC. 2. (a) Section 10701a(b)(2)(B) of title 49, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(B) The rail carrier establishing the challenged rate shall have the burden of proving that such rate is reasonable if—

"(i) such rate is greater than that authorized under section 10707a of this title and the Commission begins an investigation proceeding under section 10707 of this title to determine whether such rate is reasonable; or

"(ii) such rate results in a revenue-variable cost percentage for the transportation to which the rate applies that is equal to or greater than the lesser of the percentages described in clauses (i) and (ii) of section 10707a(e)(2)(A) of this title.".

(b) Section 10701a(b)(2) of such title is amended by adding the following new subparagraph at the end thereof:

"(C) The rail carrier shall have the burden of going forward with evidence responsive to the factors set forth in subparagraphs (B) and (D) of paragraph 3 of this subsection.".

(c) Section 10701a(b)(3) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(3) In determining whether a rate described in paragraph (1) of this subsection is reasonable, the Commission shall consider, among other factors, evidence of the following—

"(A) the relationship of the rate to the cost to the rail carrier of providing the service;

"(B) whether the traffic involved is being required to pay an unreasonable share of the carrier's fixed costs;

"(C) the impact of the rate on the attainment of national energy goals; and

"(D) the extent of additional revenues, if any, required by the carrier in order to achieve adequate revenues as established by the Commission under section 10704(a)(2) of this title, while taking into account the factors described in section 10707a(e)(2)(C) of this title.".

SEC. 3. Section 10704(a)(2) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting "(A)" after "(2)", and by striking all that follows the first sentence and inserting the following new subparagraphs:

"(B) Such standards and procedures shall provide for consideration of—

"(i) indicators of financial health including but not limited to bond ratings, return on investment, return on shareholders' equity, return on total capitalization, fixed charge coverage, debt-to-equity ratio, and operating ratio;

"(ii) the current cost of equity capital; and

"(iii) the actual cost of debt capital at the time such debt was incurred.

"(C)(i) In computing return on investment, the Commission shall include in the investment base the depreciated original cost, as determined by standard depreciation accounting practices, of only those assets which are used and useful in providing railroads' deferred tax reserves.

"(ii) The Commission shall commence within 60 days of the date of enactment of this Act a rulemaking proceeding in which the burden of proof shall rest upon the rail carriers to determine for each of the Class I railroads the extent to which its railroad assets are used and useful in providing railroad transportation service. The Commission shall update its evaluation of each rail carrier's investment base each year in connection with its annual revenue adequacy determination.

"(D) Revenue levels established under this paragraph should—

"(i) provide a flow of net income plus depreciation adequate to support prudent capital outlays, assure the repayment of a reasonable level of debt, permit the raising of needed equity capital, and cover the effects of inflation; and

"(ii) attract and retain capital in amounts adequate to provide a sound transportation system in the United States.

"(E) The Commission shall make an adequate and ocntinuing effort to assist those carriers in attaining revenue levels prescribed in this paragraph, recognizing, however, the need to maintain rates at reasonable levels where there is market dominance as defined in section 10709(a).".

SEC. 4. Section 10707a(a)(2)(B) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting ", and changes in railroad productivity, volume and output mix" after "labor" in the parenthetical clause.

SEC. 5. (a) Section 10709(d)(2) of title 49, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(2) In making a determination under this section, the Commission shall find that the rail carrier establishing the challenged rate has market dominance over the transportation to which the rate applies if—

"(A) the rate charged results in a revenue-variable cost percentage for such transportation that is more than the cost recovery percentage during each 12-month period beginning on or after October 1, 1984; and either

"(B) within the 12-month period immediately preceding the beginning of such determination process, more than 70 percent of the transportation to which the challenged rate applies was by railroad; or

"(C) a shipper, with respect to the transportation of whose property the challenged rate applies, has made a substantial investment in railroad equipment or rail-related plant which prevents or makes impracticable the use of a mode of another rail carrier or transportation other than railroads.

For purposes of subparagraph (A) of this paragraph, the cost recovery percentage shall in no event be less than a revenue-variable cost percentage of 170 percent or more than a revenue-variable cost percentage of 180 percent.".

(b) Section 10709(d) of such title is amended by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(6) No person, class of persons, transaction, or service may be exempted by the Commission under section 10505 of this title from the application of a provision of this subtitle with respect to any transportation unless a rail carrier is determined under this section not to have market dominance over such transportation, unless such transportation is pursuant to a contract entered into under section 10713 of this title.".

(c) Section 10709 of such title is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(e) In determining the existence or absence of effective competition for purposes of this section, the Commission shall consider only transporation competition for movement of the same commodity from the same point of origin to the same destination.".

SEC. 6. Except as otherwise provided, the Commission shall conclude a proceeding to establish procedures for the implementation of the amendments made by this Act within 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

By Mr. TRIBLE (for himself and Mr. SYMMS):

S. 202. A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to establish a cash or deferred arrangement permitting Federal employees to save for their retirement, and for other purposes: to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES CASH OR DEFERRED ARRANGEMENT ACT OF 1985

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, one of the most important issues confronting the 99th Congress is deficit reduction. This Congress faces the enormous responsibility of finding ways to reduce the $200 billion Federal deficit, and all areas of the Federal budget will be examined for ways to restrain Federal spending and reduce the deficit.

Already, proposals have been offered to reduce Federal spending by drastically reducing civil service retirement benefits for Federal workers. Lower annuities and higher employee contributions are among the suggestions. Federal employees hired after December 31, 1983, have faced uncertain retirement benefits since joining the Federal work force. These employees are covered under Social Security and a supplemental retirement system which is still not designed. Congress must establish this system by the end of 1985.

Many employers outside the Federal Government offer their employees the opportunity to participate in tax-sheltered retirement programs. And increasingly, employers are offering deferred compensation plans authorized by section 401(k) of the Internal Revenue Code.

These plans allow an employee to elect to defer a portion of his or her salary and have the employer deposit that amount into an investment or savings account. The amount of the deferred salary, any employer contributions to the account, and investment earnings, are tax-exempt until the employee withdraws the funds. Funds may be withdrawn from these accounts only when the employee retires, dies, becomes disabled, separates from the service, reaches age 59½, or for reasons of hardship.

These tax-deferred accounts allow employees to save money for use in their retirement years. And, employees have the opportunity to determine, within a range, the amount of their salary that they wish to defer.

I believe that Federal employees should be given the opportunity to plan for the future and save for their retirement. That is why I am introducing legislation which would allow Federal employees to participate in tax-sheltered deferred compensation plans comparable to plans offered to their non-Federal counterparts.

My legislation would permit an employee to set aside up to 5 percent of his or her basic pay under the cash or deferred arrangement. The employing agency will be authorized to deduct and withhold that portion of the employee's pay and deposit that amount, along with an equal amount contributed by the agency, into an account.

Funds may be withdrawn from the account only in those instances outlined in section 401(k) of the Internal Revenue Code: upon the employee's retirement, death, disability, separation from the service, attainment of ages 59½, or for reasons of hardship. In addition, employees participating in the cash or deferred arrangement may be able to qualify for a loan which can be repayed through payroll deductions.

The Congress must design a new retirement program for Federal workers who were hired after December 31, 1983. I believe that this new plan should include this deferred compensation plan. A Federal retirement program consisting of Social Security, a pension plan, and a capital accumulation plan such as the deferred compensation plan authorized by section 401(k) of the Internal Revenue Code would be consistent with retirement programs typically available to employees outside the Federal sector.

Mr. President, in the wake of uncertainty with future retirement benefits for Federal workers, we should provide civil servants with the opportunity to elect to defer payment of a portion of their salary in order to set aside money for use in their retirement years. I urge my colleagues to join with me in pressing for consideration of this measure.

By Mr. DIXON:

S. 203. A bill to provide a one-time amnesty from criminal and civil tax penalties and 50 percent of the interest penalty owed for certain taxpayers who pay previous underpayments of Federal tax during the amnesty period, to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to increase by 50 percent all criminal and civil tax penalties, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

FEDERAL TAX DELINQUENCY AMNESTY ACT OF 1985

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the Federal budget deficit in fiscal year 1984 was an appalling $175 billion. The latest estimate for the fiscal 1985 deficit prepared by the President's Office of Management and Budget is even worse—$205 billion. This ongoing budget crisis, however, seems to defy the efforts of Congress and the President to end it. Budget deficits are not under control in spite of the major efforts to cut spending over the past 4 years, and in spite of the passage of two major tax increase bills in the last 3 years.

There are a lot of reasons for our budget crisis. One very important reason that has not received anywhere near the attention it deserves has to do with tax compliance levels.

In 1981, the most recent year for which comprehensive data is available, Federal tax collections were more than $81 billion below what they would have been if every taxpayer had paid his or her legal tax obligations. Individual taxpayers failed to report to the Internal Revenue Service almost $250 billion in income that year.

Unfortunately, 1981 is not an unusual year. The "tax gap" was more than $28 billion in 1973, or approximately double the Federal budget deficit of $14 billion that year, and it has increased steadily since then. The Treasury Department is estimating a tax gap of between $89 and $92 billion for 1985, and believes that level could rise to between $386 and $473 billion by the turn of the century.

These figures indicate that there is something fundamentally wrong with our national tax collection system. The tax gap is growing not just because the economy is growing, but also because taxpayers are increasingly not paying the taxes they owe. A recent story in the Wall Street Journal illustrates the point. It states that:

> The IRS says 19 percent of those surveyed admit to cheating on their taxes, and that probably is an underestimate of the actual number who do.

Our tax collection system in the past was able to rely on voluntary compliance with the tax laws, but that voluntary compliance is breaking down. For example, in 1973 more than 90 percent of all dividends were reported; by 1981, that percentage fell to approximately 83 percent. In 1973, over 75 percent of all capital gains were reported; by 1981, that percentage had fallen below 60 percent. According to the Internal Revenue Service, there is currently about 80 percent compliance overall among individuals and about 90 percent compliance for corporations.

The Service believes that the compliance rate for individuals is falling by about 0.2 percent per year. Now that may not seem like a large number, but over time, and given the size of the U.S. economy, it represents a real problem.

This tax cheating, Mr. President, has a dramatic impact on our budget crisis. In 1981, for example, the Federal deficit was $57.9 billion. Including off-budget borrowing programs, the total deficit was approximately $78.9 billion, still smaller than the tax gap that year of over $81 billion. What this means is that if everyone had paid the taxes they owed that year, there would have been no deficit. In 1976, as I stated earlier, the effect was even more dramatic; 100 percent compliance that year would have resulted in a Federal budget surplus, instead of a deficit, and would have permitted an actual reduction in the national debt.

The tax gap raises two kinds of issues: First, there are questions involving improving compliance rates over time. Congress, in the last two tax bills, has taken a number of steps to improve compliance. Tax legislation to be considered this year, I am sure, will take additional steps to improve compliance, and increase the fairness of Federal tax laws.

Second, there are questions involving how to recover some of the missing tax revenues from prior years. The States, which have had compliance problems similar to those experienced at the national level, have undetaken a number of efforts to deal with this matter, and perhaps the most innovative of these is tax amnesty.

Eight states—Illinois, Alabama, Arizona, Idaho, Massachusetts, Missouri, North Dakota, and Texas—have tried tax amnesty periods. Illinois and Massachusetts had legislative amnesty programs; the other State programs were set up by their revenue departments or Governors.

Amnesty is a simple concept. It provides an opportunity for delinquent taxpayers to fully pay their overdue tax liability, without being subject to crimnal prosecution. Amnesty programs have also involved reductions, or elimination, of civil and interest penalties in order to create an incentive for tax payers to make use of the amnesty period.

While the State amnesty programs differed in scope, extent, and many other particulars, they did have one thing in common: They were successful. They all resulted in taxpayers coming forward to pay overdue taxes who would probably have not otherwise done so. The State of Massachusetts, for example, collected over $72 million. In my own State of Illinois, collections exceeded $150 million.

The State programs were not giveaways, Mr. President. They did not reward tax cheaters. The State programs increased compliance efforts and increased penalties for noncompliance after the amnesty period. The State programs resulted in placing additional taxpayers on the roles, and in additional tax collections that the States would probably not otherwise have received.

Because I believe a national tax amnesty program could be effective and ought to be tried, I am today introducing the Federal Tax Delinquency Amnesty Act of 1985.

This bill establishes a 6-month amnesty period, to begin on July 1 of this year, or as soon thereafter as pactical. The amnesty would cover all tax years through 1983 still eligible for collection efforts by the IRS—which can go back 7 years.

All taxpayers would be eligible for the amnesty, with the following limited exceptions: First, those involved with the IRS in administrative or judicial proceedings before the amnesty period begins; second, those under criminal investigation where the IRS has referred the matter to the Justice Department before the amnesty period begins; and third, those who make false or fraudulent representations in attempting to take advantage of the amnesty.

The amnesty itself would be simple and straightforward. It would include amnesty from criminal and civil penalties and from 50 percent of any interest penalty owed. However, the amnesty would apply only to legal-source income. Taxes due on income resulting from criminal activity would not be covered by the amnesty.

All Federal taxes would be covered by the amnesty, not just the Federal income tax.

The amnesty provisions are generous and provide a substantial incentive for taxpayers to take advantage of the amnesty period. However, the bill does not rely just on carrots, it also contains a couple of substantial sticks.

First, it increases all tax-related civil and criminal penalties, including money fines and jail terms, by 50 percent. The tougher penalties will apply to any tax year after 1984, and, after the amnesty period, to any open tax year. Of course, the increased penalties will not apply to cases pending on the date of enactment where a judgment was entered before that date.

Second, the bill authorizes such funds as are necessary to add 3,000 additional revenue agents to the IRS, an increase of about 20 percent in the agent force. This is an extremely cost-effective provision, because each additional agent brings in approximately 12½ times his salary in additional tax revenue, depending on where enforcement efforts are concentrated.

The bill also authorizes the funds the Treasury will need to administer and publicize the amnesty program. The State experience demonstrates that wide publicity can significantly enhance the effectiveness of an amnesty program.

I recognize, Mr. President, that amnesty, by itself, will not solve the fundamental problems that have led to decreasing levels of voluntary compliance with the tax laws. I know that it is equally true that tougher penalties and additional IRS agents are not enough to totally arrest the growth of the tax gap.

A comprehensive reexamination of our tax law, designed to restore the fairness that many taxpayers believe has been lost, is necessary to restore the kind of voluntary compliance that the United States has been used to and to which our country is entitled.

What amnesty will do is collect substantial tax revenues from past years that would not be otherwise collected. Increasingly, the public is convinced that the Tax Code is unfair and that many taxpayers get away with cheating. Amnesty can help reverse that perception by collecting at least part of those tax obligations. It will demonstrate that the Federal Government is a good manager, and willing to take substantial steps to obtain the taxes that are legally required to be paid.

Amnesty will benefit the honest taxpayer, because it will bring in additional revenue that could help lessen the need for further tax increases.

Efforts to restore fairness, simplicity, and equity to our tax laws are necessarily future-oriented. Amnesty, on the other hand, is oriented toward past actions, or in this case, past tax delinquencies.

By bringing forward new taxpayers and those who did not fully pay their past taxes, however, the amnesty will have much more than a one-time impact. Having additional taxpayers on the rolls is a permanent benefit, and the amnesty will also help the IRS to focus its future enforcement efforts on the areas that are the most promising.

Now some may say that amnesty is unfair, and that it rewards tax delinquents. While I understand that argument, I do not find it persuasive. Amnesty is clearly more fair than not collecting the unpaid taxes at all, which is otherwise what would, in all likelihood, be the result. Amnesty, far from rewarding tax delinquents, actually collects the taxes due, together with at least some interest. Again, given the alternatives, it is hard to conceive of that as a reward.

I know, Mr. President, that this Congress will be spending a lot of time considering tax issues. I urge my colleagues to consider the role that tax amnesty legislation can play in any comprehensive tax bill. Tax amnesty has demonstrated that it can work in the States. There is no reason to believe that it will not be even more successful at the national level. I urge my colleagues, therefore, to consider this proposal carefully, and to act promptly to enact it into law. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill and a summary of its provisions be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 203

By Mr. BUMPERS (for himself, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. JOHNSTON, and Mr. MOYNIHAN):

S. 204. A bill to provide a national program for improving the quality of instruction in the humanities in public and private elementary and secondary schools; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

HUMANITIES EXCELLENCE AND TEACHER TRAINING ACT OF 1985

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Humanities Excellence and Teacher Training Act of 1985 on behalf of Senator INOUYE, Senator JOHNSTON, Senator

MOYNIHAN, and myself. This bill will improve the quality of humanities instruction in our schools by providing summer training institutes for elementary and secondary school humanities teachers.

In the last year many of us, in response to the several Education Commission reports, have made public statements decrying the state of American education. Our reaction to these reports is reminiscent of our reaction to the launching of sputnik in 1957. At the time of sputnik, Adm. Hyman Rickover insisted that our schools had endangered the Nation's security by neglecting those with talent. The recent National Commission on Excellence on Education stated in its report, "A Nation at Risk," "If an unfriendly foreign power had attempted to impose on America the mediocre educational performance that exists today, we might have viewed it as an act of war." One of the less alarmist and more positive statements—perhaps an understatement—was made by the Carnegie Foundation Commission, which asserted only that "revitalizing the American high school is an urgent matter."

In 1957 science education was the primary concern. Congress rushed to approve the National Defense Education Act, which spurred the teaching of the hard sciences, mathematics, and foreign languages in the public schools. This act provided funds for new courses in math, science, and foreign languages and to modernize school laboratories, and as a result enrollments in math, science, and foreign language classes soared. Once again, in 1984, we were greeted by the need to improve math and science instruction. The conclusions of the recent commissions, combined with our fears that we're being "bested" by other nations in technical training, that we're losing our industrial edge, and the fact that we can't keep qualified math and science teachers in our public schools, have prompted us to act to stop this decline.

Last year we approved the math and science bill. The 2-year program authorized by this bill attempts to bolster the quality of math and science teaching by providing for training and retraining programs for math and science teachers. I wholeheartedly support the math and science bill. However, I think we're going to pay a high price if we continue to teach our children sophisticated computer programming skills and complex telecommunications technology but teach them little about the U.S. Constitution, the works of American artists, the writings of poets and philosophers, or the history of this Nation and its people.

The tragic effects of this lack of emphasis on the humanities was recently summed up in the report of the Study Group on the State of Learning in the Humanities in Higher Education. The report, entitled "To Reclaim a Legacy," says that many of our country's college and university graduates do not receive an adequate humanities education. William J. Bennett, Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities stated, "Too many students are graduating from American colleges and universities lacking even the most rudimentary knowledge about the history, literature, arts, and philosophical foundations of their Nation and their civilization." I believe this problem is faced not only by our college and university students, but also by students in our elementary and secondary schools.

The tragic consequences of neglecting to teach the humanities are obvious. A 1978 study reported that the ability of 17-year-olds to explain democracy's essentials had declined 12 points in 6 years. A 1979 Gallup poll reported that only 3 percent of the Nation's 17- and 18-year-olds could identify Alaska and Hawaii as the last States to join the Union, and we know that fewer Americans vote than in almost any other democratic nation. And those facts and figures don't begin to suggest Americans' scandalous lack of understanding of our history and government. The very survival of our democratic institutions depends on an educated citizenry, so it is not wrong to suggest that the future of our country is at stake.

A 1980 editorial in the Chronicle of Higher Education suggested that scholars trained in the humanities seek jobs as technical writers for computer firms—turning computer manuals into English. The humanists should have no trouble getting these jobs, the writer noted, since so many computer programmers have weak writing skills. The editorialist noted this employment opportunity for humanists with pleasure, but it seems shameful to me that we treat so cavalierly the weak writing skills of some of our most highly trained computer programmers. It's a tragedy that individuals with such sophisticated technical skills can't even communicate their knowledge of computers to their fellow citizens.

Many individual educational institutions and corporations are realizing the value of humanities education. In 1981, a vice president of a major U.S. corporation noted in the Wall Street Journal that his corporation was no longer recruiting only employees with MBA's but was also recruiting BA's in the humanities. He praised the undergraduates with humanities training for their writing ability, analytical ability, adaptability and their willingness and success in working on unstructured research projects. In addition, many technical colleges are finding that their students can't compete in the job market without a strong background in the humanities. If their training is narrow, they can't adapt when their technical expertise is quickly outdated. Many technical colleges are instituting requirements that their students take a strong core of humanities courses. Cobol and Fortran are transient; English is not.

Jerome Weisner, former president of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, states, "A person is much less of a human being if he thinks of himself only as a technocrat." He is right. Our emphasis in the recent past has been on training Americans to do a job; as jobs have required more sophisticated technical skills, our education has become more technical. But jobs don't last forever. Our schools are churning out technocrats, and that's a dangerous trend. Technology is moving and developing so fast that students who receive only a technical training have a hard time adapting when the technology changes. I also believe that an education is something more than teaching students the skills necessary to do a job. There are many practical reasons to teach the humanities, but those reasons aren't the most important. I am convinced that exposure to and good teaching in the humanities will help our citizens cope with difficult questions about human life.

For example, we now have the ability to save seriously ill infants who would not have had a chance for survival only a few years ago, yet doctors and clergy and policymakers are embroiled in controversy over the proper use and implications of this technology. We can also prolong the lives of the very ill and injured almost indefinitely, but we can't define the quality of life those individuals should enjoy. These are issues which theologians and philosophers should be discussing with technicians and scientists, issues which we should be asking our students to think seriously about.

The humanities force us to answer important questions about the moral issues of our life and the history and traditions that shape our society, fundamental human questions. The philosophers, prophets, and poets raise questions which have been with man since the dawn of history. American schools must make the humanities the center of our education, not an add-on that is taken care of after we've taught sophisticated technical or vocational skills. After all, what are those skills worth if we can't discuss important issues or dilemmas that confront us?

When Thomas Jefferson explained his plan for education, he said that students should study history because:

> History, by apprising them of the past, will enable them to judge of the future; it will avail them of the experiences of other times and other nations; it will qualify them as judges of the actions and designs of men; it will enable them to know ambition under every disguise it may assume, and knowing it, to defeat its views.

Jefferson is usually noted for his influence on scientific education, but his view of education was not narrow. Jefferson understood that the humanities—especially history—must be a part of our education if we are to know how to use our knowledge and govern ourselves.

I am convinced that our students must have a strong background in the humanities, and that means quality teachers. I am here today to introduce a measure which would provide teacher training institutes for teachers of the humanities—philosophy, history, classical languages, and literature. These teacher training programs are based on a very successful program carried out in 1983 by the the National Endowment for the Humanitites and expanded in 1984 with the help of a Mellon Foundation grant. This program has provided teachers the opportunity to study literature, philosophy, history, and other subjects in summer seminars, but the seminars reach only a small proportion of our humanities teachers. In 1984 the NEH programs included 765 teachers. In 1982, however, there were 1,040,000 secondary school teachers and 1,364,000 elementary school teachers in the United States. Clearly, the NEH program is not enough.

The measure I am introducing would authorize grants by the Secretary of Education of institutions of higher education to conduct teacher training institutes in the humanities for elementary and secondary school teachers. The institutions of higher education or consortia of institutions would submit applications including the proposed program of instruction, teaching faculty, and the procedures for selecting participants. Funds would be provided for operating costs and faculty salaries as well as living allowances and small stipends for participants. The awards shall be made to institutions on the basis of excellence of the proposed programs, and each State will be awarded at least one institute.

The institutes will recognize teachers for their achievement as classroom teachers, give them an opportunity to study further their own area or other areas of the humanities, and allow them to share ideas on the teaching of their discipline. One participant in an NEH seminar last summer said the seminars say to teachers: "We think you are important." The training institutes authorized by this bill would say that the teaching of humanities and teachers of humanities are very important. Our teachers are our greatest educational asset, and only by keeping good teachers in our schools and providing them additional training can we hope to provide our citizens strong training in the humanities. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this measure to improve humanities instruction in our schools.

I ask unanimous consent that the Humanities Excellence and Teacher Training Act of 1985 be printed immediately following my remarks, along with a brief section-by-section analysis of the bill.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 204

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

GRANTS FOR TEACHER TRAINING INSTITUTES IN THE HUMANITIES

SEC. 1. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) it is in the national interest to have citizens who are broadly educated. Our nation's schools must prepare young people for active participation in community life and a democratic society. This is not possible without knowledge and understanding of the humanities.

(2) in order to ensure that our nation's children acquire the conceptual and analytical skills necessary and have an appreciation for the traditions and values of Western and non-Western cultures, studies in the humanities are essential.

(3) it is necessary to improve the quality of instruction in the humanities and it is not possible to accomplish this goal unless our nation's teachers have the necessary background and training in the humanities.

(b) It is therefore the purpose of this Act to authorize a national program for improving the quality of education which would make grants to institutions of higher education for the establishment and operation of teacher institutes for the enhancement of subject matter skills of private and public elementary and secondary school teachers of the humanities.

(c) This act may be cited as "The Humanities Excellence and Teacher Training Act of 1985."

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary shall make grants in each State to an institution of higher education (or a consortium of such institutions) whose application is approved under subsection (b) for the purposes of conducting summer humanities training institutes for the professional development of elementary and secondary school humanities teachers. Any institution or consortium whose application is so approved shall receive an amount equal to not more than $3,000 multiplied by the number of teachers, not to exceed two hundred, enrolled in such institute.

(b) Any institution of higher education or consortium desiring to receive a grant in its State shall submit an application to the Secretary at such time, in such form, and containing such information and assurances as the Secretary may require. No such application may be approved by the Secretary unless the application—

(1) contains a description of the proposed program of instruction, and the extent to which eligible classroom teacher participants will be involved in the planning and design of the institutes;

(2) contains an estimate of the number of teachers, including the number of teachers from private elementary and secondary schools, to attend the institute, and describes the selection procedures;

(3) describes the nature and location of existing facilities to be used in the operation of the institute;

(4) specifies the teaching and administrative staff for the institute including the involvement of faculty from both the humanities and education departments and educators familiar with the operation of humanities programs in elementary and secondary schools;

(5) specifies the academic credits, if any, to be awarded for the completion of the course of study to be offered at the institute;

(6) provides a schedule of stipends to be paid teacher participants in the institute, including (A) allowances for subsistence and other expenses for teachers attending the institute and their dependents and (B) provisions assuring that there will be no duplication of Federal benefits paid to participants;

(7) provides adequate assurances that teachers from the State who wish to participate will be selected on the basis of recommendations from a principal or other supervisory official and a demonstrated commitment to the teaching of the humanities discipline or disciplines studied in the institute; and

(8) provides assurances that the institution of higher education will seek to enroll at least eighty qualified teachers in the institute;

(9) is approved by the State educational agency or agencies, of the States or States in which the applicant institution or consortium is located, as being consistent with State policies in elementary and secondary education and humanities.

(c) Awards under this section shall be made to the institutions (or consortia) on the basis of excellence of the program proposed in the application, taking into consideration such elements as library resources, faculty achievement, and humanities learning facilities.

(d) Funds available to institutions under this section may be used to cover costs associated with enrollment in an institute, including tuition, fees, administration, and living expenses.

(e) In making grants under this section, the Secretary shall assure, to the maximum extent consistent with the purposes of this Act, that there is an equitable distribution of institutes established and operated under approved applications among States and within States. The Secretary shall award not less than one institute in each State.

(f) No grant to a single application may exceed $600,000 in any fiscal year.

SEC. 3. No grants shall be made or contracts entered into under this Act except to such extent, or in such amounts, as may be provided in the appropriation Acts.

SEC. 4. For the purposes of this Act:

(1) The term "institution of higher education" means any institution of higher education, as defined under section 1201(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965, which is located within a State, and includes a community college or junior college.

(2) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education.

(3) The term "State" means any of the several States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(4) The term "humanities" means both modern and classical languages, literature, history, and philosophy; and language arts and social studies when taught in elementary schools.

(5) The term "State educational agency" has the same meaning as in section 198(a)(17) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act.

SEC. 5. There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this Act $50,000,000 for fiscal year 1986, $60,000,000 for fiscal year 1987, and $70,000,000 for fiscal year 1988.

BRIEF SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF SENATOR BUMPERS' "HUMANITIES EXCELLENCE AND TEACHER TRAINING ACT OF 1985"

SECTION 1

(a) Congressional findings about the importance of education in the humanities.

(b) Statement of the purpose of the Act, which is to authorize a national program of teacher training institutes to enhance the quality of instruction in the humanities.

(c) This Act may be cited as "The Humanities Excellence and Teacher Training Act of 1985."

SECTION 2

(a) Authorization for the Secretary of Education to make grants to colleges, universities, community colleges and junior colleges to conduct summer humanities teacher training institutes to train elementary and secondary humanities teachers. Grants would be in the amount of $3000 multiplied by the number of teachers, not to exceed 200, enrolled in the particular institute. At least one institute would be funded in each state.

(b) Applicants to conduct institutes must submit applications to the Secretary. The Secretary may approve only those applications that meet nine specific requirements; the applicant must describe, among other things, the proposed program of instruction, the number of participants in the institute, the selection procedures for participants, the teaching staff for the institute, the facilities to be used by the institute, the academic credits if any to be awarded by the institute, and the stipends to be paid to participants. The application must also be approved by the state educational agency, for the state in which the institute is to be conducted, as consistent with state humanities education policy.

(c) The Secretary would be required to make awards for institutes on the basis of the excellence of the program of instruction proposed.

(d) Awards of funds for institutes may be used to cover tuition, fees, administration, living expenses of participants, and related expenses.

(e) In making grants, the Secretary must assure, to the maximum extent consistent with the purposes of the Act, that there will be an equitable distribution of institutes approved among and within states. Each state will be awarded at least one institute.

(f) The maximum amount of any grant for an institute is $600,000 in any fiscal year.

SECTION 3

Grants are limited by the amount of funds appropriated to carry out this Act.

SECTION 4

Definitions. Humanities is defined to mean both modern and classical languages, literature, history, and philosophy; and language arts and social studies when taught in elementary schools. The definitions also make clear that colleges, universities, community colleges, and junior colleges are eligible to submit applications for approval to conduct training institutes under this Act.

SECTION 5

$50,000,000 is authorized for FY 86, $60,000,000 for FY 87, and $70,000,000 for FY 88.

By Mr. BUMPERS:

S. 205. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a mechanism for taxpayers to designate $1 of any overpayment of income tax, and to contribute other amounts, for payment to the National Organ Transplant Trust Fund; to the Committee on Finance.

ORGAN TRANSPLANT CONTRIBUTIONS ACT OF 1985

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing a bill which I first conceived and offered in the 98th Congress on behalf of Senator PROXMIRE and myself. This bill will benefit thousands of Americans who, in my judgment, are more deserving of our help and our sympathy than perhaps any other segment of our society. Those people, Mr. President, are those thousands of Americans who are so desperately ill that their only medical remedy lies in organ transplant surgery. I am today introducing the Organ Transplant Contributions Act of 1985.

Let me begin, Mr. President, by telling you a story. Every Member of this body, I am confident, has heard a story similar to this during his or her service in the Senate. In January 1984 a young man named Charles David Stevens, who lives in North Little Rock, called my office with a rather desperate plea for help. David Stevens was 28 years old and was very seriously ill with diabetes. David had already, some time ago, had a kidney transplant, and his doctors had told him that his only hope now lay in a pancreas transplant. The University of Minnesota Hospital, certainly one of the best in the United States, had agreed to perform a pancreas transplant for David. And David's mother had also agreed to give him part of her pancreas. Only a mother, I suppose, could give as Mrs. Stevens has done for David. You see, she had already given David a kidney, and she was now prepared to give him half of her pancreas. David's problem, however, was money. The University of Minnesota required a downpayment of $35,000 before David and his mother would be admitted to surgery. David had been working desperately for a number of months making pleas on radio and television and through his church in an effort to collect this enormous sum. He had been doing very well in this effort, but $35,000 is a lot of money in Arkansas. David was asking me to help him in this effort, and I was certainly glad to try. But, as every Member of this body is aware, there is not a great deal that a U.S. Senator can do to cajole an insurance company into paying a claim that it does not believe it is obligated to pay. And the fact is that many, if not most, organ transplants today are not covered by insurance. Certainly, David's insurance coverage was not adequate. I am delighted to report that David was able to raise this money and his operation was a complete success. He is no longer a diabetic, but his hospital bill totaled more than $70,000.

Mr. President, in the past year a great deal of national attention has been focused on organ transplantation. It is an immensely complex issue. It seems to me, however, that our efforts thus far fall short of addressing the crucial issue for most organ transplant patients. That issue is cost. These operations tend to be enormously expensive, and there are thousands of Americans who could benefit from organ transplants if the problems of donor location and cost could be addressed. The bill which I am introducing today, Mr. President, will specifically address the problem of cost by appealing to our Nation's best impulses and by taking advantage of our existing tax structure. In a nutshell, what I proposed to do is to establish a "National Organ Transplant Trust Fund" in the Treasury, which would be funded by voluntary contributions made through a checkoff system on the income tax form, and which would provide funds to needy organ transplant patients.

The statistics on organ transplant procedures, Mr. President, are quite amazing. Until I began working on this bill, I had no idea how many transplant operations occur in this country each year and yet how many thousands of Americans still need organ transplants. There are now a total of 160 transplant centers in the United States; 159 of these transplant centers perform kidney transplants while only 11 perform heart transplants and only 6 perform liver transpalnts. I am proud to say, by the way, that the University of Arkansas Medical Center was a pioneer in the area of kidney transplant surgery. Most startling, Mr. President, is the fact that as many as 14,200 Americans between the ages of 10 and 54 could benefit from heart transplants. Yet, in 1983, there were only 172 heart transplants in this country. On the other hand, there were 5,500 kidney transplants, while there are at least 7,000 people on waiting lists for kidney transplant surgery. In 1983 there were 160 liver transplants, but experts tell me that somewhere between 4,000 and 5,000 Americans could benefit from liver transplant surgery. Last year there were between 18,000 and 20,000 cornea transplants in the United States, an operation that has become commonplace. There were, on the other hand, only 150 pancreas transplants.

I believe, Mr. President, that costs, as well as the experimental nature of some types of transplant surgery, is a major factor in so many Americans being unable to receive transplant surgery which they desperately need. It seems to me significant that Medicare will pay for kidney transplant surgery, which is now considered almost routine, but neither Medicare, Medicaid, nor many private insurance carriers will pay for many of the more recent and experimental procedures. Fortunately, Medicare will also pay for the corneal implant surgery for persons over 65, a factor which no doubt has something to do with the large number of corneal procedures performed last year. The availability of donor organs is, of course, a major problem and one which is addressed by legislation which has been passed in the House and the Senate. On the other hand, I am persuaded that legislation thus far does not adequately deal with the issue of cost, and that it is simply unrealistic to expect so many Americans to bear the enormous cost of these procedures by themselves, or even to be able to go into their communities and raise such enormous sums, often small communities, from charitable sources.

So, Mr. President, the idea occurred to me that we could and should use our existing revenue collection procedures to allow Americans to make voluntary charitable contributions to help their fellow citizens. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that every American would like to reach out and help his brother and sister in this situation. What we need is a mechanism and what I propose is a simple checkoff system on the income tax form which would allow taxpayers to designate $1, $2, $3, or any portion of their tax refund to be deposited in a special trust fund to be created in the Treasury Department. Let me say, Mr. President, first of all what I do not intend to do. I do not intend to create a new entitlement program. I do not intend to create any government health program for which we would have to increase the deficit and the national debt. All I propose is a program to be funded by voluntary contributions by taxpayers who, I think, would like very much to give.

The National Organ Transplant Trust Fund would be administered by the Secretary of Health and Human Services. My proposal, is to help those people who have no other source of payment. My aim is to help the David Stevens of the world, those who have little or no private insurance and those for whom Medicare and Medicaid are unavailable. The Secretary, after promulgating regulations which would establish an organ transplant payments program, would make payment to needy individuals, after taking into account the individuals resources and his or her ability to raise funds from other sources, including charities and any State resources which might be available.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the key to this program should be speed and flexibility. These people are desperately ill, often critically ill, and they are certainly in no position to withstand any drawn out bureaucratic process. This program cannot be the complete answer for these patients, but I hope it will be a start. It will provide seed money which will help them to raise money from other sources. I do not intend, for there to be any drawn out appeal process under this program, just as there is no appeal under our veterans programs. The Secretary, presumably through the Health Care Financing Administration, should simply decide these cases fairly and as quickly as possible. Payments could then be made to the eligible transplant centers, which have been designated by the Secretary, on behalf of the needy transplant recipient.

There is not a Member of this body, Mr. President, who does not appreciate the seriousness and the urgency of this problem on a personal level. I dare say there is not a Member of Congress who has not had a call or a letter from someone in a situation as desperate as David Stevens was. Many of them, unfortunately, have not enjoyed the good result that David did. It is my hope, Mr. President, that through enactment of this legislation, we can help many more of our fellow Americans than we have been doing on an individual basis.

This, Mr. President, is what government should be about—helping people who need help. My proposal will not cost the Treasury anything. It will not increase the national deficit, and it will not take anything from anyone who does not want to give. I invite Members to join me in cosponsoring this bill.

By Mr. TRIBLE (for himself, Mr. HUMPHREY, and Mr. EAST):

S. 206. A bill to amend section 5155 of the Revised Statutes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

BANKING CONVENIENCE ACT

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, one of the most welcome developments of recent years has been the creation and growth of networks of shared automated teller machines [ATM's]. Consumers benefit greatly from these networks, as their huge size and rapid growth attests.

Today, along with Senators HUMPHREY and EAST, and Representatives LAFALCE and WORTLEY in the House, I am introducing legislation, the Banking Convenience Act to protect and foster these shared ATM networks, which are threatened by a recent court decision.

This legislation is nearly identical to a bill Senator HUMPHREY and I introduced in the last Congress, S. 2898. That bill was the subject of thorough hearings in the Senate Banking Committee on September 19 and 20, 1984. Twelve of the fourteen witnesses favored adoption of the bill, including the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the National Credit Union Administration, the American Bankers' Association, the Consumer Bankers' Association, the U.S. League of Savings Institutions, the Credit Union National Association, the Electronic Funds Transfer Association, Consumers' Union, Bankcard Holders of America, Mastercard International, and the Food Marketing Institute.

Before explaining the need for the bill, and what it does, a brief introduction to ATM's and shared ATM networks is needed.

1. ATMS AND SHARED ATM NETWORKS

Automated teller machines [ATM's] are electronic devices which permit consumers to communicate with their financial institutions and to perform routine banking transactions. By inserting a plastic card into the ATM, typing in an identification number, and specifying the desired transaction, the consumer can use an ATM to withdraw cash from an account, get a cash advance on his credit card, make deposits, transfer funds among accounts or to third parties, and make balance inquiries.

The convenience of ATM's for consumers is obvious. ATM's permit afterhours banking, and allow consumers to spend less time in bank lines. They can conduct their banking business at odd hours and on weekends, swiftly, accurately, and at low cost.

Over the past decade, the consumer convenience of ATM's has been enormously expanded by the creation of far-flung networks of shared automated teller machines. In these networks, ATM's established and owned by one institution—bank, thrift, or credit union—are made available to customers of other institutions. Sharing permits customers traveling away from home on business or pleasure to communicate with their home bank through ATM's located tens, hundreds, or even thousands of miles from home.

Often, shared ATM's are located where the customer's own bank could not establish its own branch or ATM for economic or legal reasons. This, too, benefits consumers.

Without question, consumers want and demand the geographic convenience provided by shared ATM networks.

Ten years ago, there were only a handful of ATM's. Today, over 200 regional shared ATM networks serve customers all over the United States, allowing consumers to use more than 16,000 ATM's to conduct more than 60 million transactions per month. And, by using over 10,000 ATM's linked by computer into seven nationwide shared ATM networks, consumers today can obtain instant cash from their accounts virtually anywhere in the United States.

All told, more than 9,000 banks, savings institutions, credit unions, credit card companies, and retailers already participate in shared ATM networks. Membership is common among both large and small, Federal and State chartered, institutions. Many more institutions plan to join networks in the future in order to serve current customers better and to attract new ones.

Clearly, anything which harms the networks could harm the customers of all these institutions—customers who already are using 50 million ATM access cards.

With that background, why is legislation needed to preserve and foster these shared ATM networks and their consumer benefits?

THE NEED FOR LEGISLATION

In April 1984, the U.S. District Court for the Western District of New York issued a ruling which could ultimately disrupt or even destroy many existing networks of shared ATM's, and so could severely inconvenience millions of network users. In addition, the cost of financial services provided through surviving networks would increase, significant investments in the networks would be jeopardized, and national banks could be placed at a significant competitive disadvantage. As one witness told the Senate Banking Committee, the court's ruling, if upheld, would be "an unmitigated disaster for the EFT industry."

In the case of Independent Bankers' Association of New York versus Marine Midland Bank—Marine Midland—the court held that if the customers of a national bank use a third party's ATM to make deposits to or withdraw funds from their home bank, then that ATM is a branch of the national bank for purposes of the McFadden Act. That 1933 Federal law restricts branching by national banks and permits a national bank headquartered in a certain State to establish branches only where State law allows State chartered banks to have branches.

Because the McFadden Act itself does not permit interstate branching by national banks, and because many States restrict branching within their borders, the Marine Midland court's decision implies that many national banks are engaged in illegal branch banking when they permit their customers to use ATM's in shared networks. This would be true if the network included ATM's in several States—as 21 of the 25 largest networks do—or if an intrastate network included ATM's in locations where no single bank could branch.

If the court is correct, and a shared ATM is a branch, then national banks could not allow their customers to use ATM's in another State. In the 29 States which do not permit statewide branching, national bank customers would be denied use of any in State ATM located where the bank itself could not branch. The Marine Midland case itself resulted in customers of one New York bank being denied use of an ATM located in a small New York town.

In effect, national banks would be unable to participate in many existing networks, and their customers would lose, if the Marine Midland ruling stands.

On its face, the Marine case appears to pose a problem only for national banks and their customers. Yet testimony before the Senate Banking Committee confirms that adverse effects could be far broader if the decision became the law of the land.

For example, State banks which are members of the Federal Reserve System, and their customers, could also be directly harmed, since such banks are subject to the same branching restrictions as national banks under other provisions of Federal law. Thus, participation of State member banks in national and regional networks of shared ATM's could also be restricted.

Ill-effects of the case would not be confined to National and State member banks and their customers, however, but could also spread to State nonmember banks, thrifts, credit unions, credit card companies, retailers, and their customers.

These varied institutions and customers all participate in existing shared ATM networks, and any development which jeopardize bank participation in the networks affects them. S&L's comprise 10 percent of the membership of the 50 largest ATM networks, for example, and credit union membership is widespread and growing very rapidly, with credit unions already participating in half of the 50 largest networks.

It is easy to see how all actual and potential users of shared ATM's would be hurt if reduced national bank participation caused certain networks to disappear, or to contract geographically. Consumers would lose access to many ATM's, which they now use, and would suffer a significant loss of convenience.

More subtle damage would be done to customers of remaining networks. With fewer financial institutions participating, the heavy fixed costs of shared networks would have to be spread over fewer customers and transactions. The cost to each remaining user for each transaction would go up, perhaps significantly. In this way, the Marine ruling could undermine economies of scale and burden all customers of the networks. In short, if Marine Midland becomes law everyone would come out the loser—banks, the EFT industry, and consumers.

Viewing all these potential problems of the Marine decision, many agencies and trade groups have submitted friend of the court briefs seeking to overturn the Marine ruling. These groups include the Comptroller of the Currency, together with Federal Reserve and the FDIC, the Electronic Funds Transfer Association, the Consumer Bankers' Association, Mastercard, and others.

3. THE BANKING CONVENIENCE ACT

Congress should act to prevent the disastrous ripple effects which the Marine Midland ruling could cause. The Banking Convenience Act would avert them.

The bill simply declares that an ATM used by a national bank's customers—but not owned or rented by that bank—is not a branch of that bank for purposes of the McFadden Act. Consequently, the bank's customers may continue to use ATM's not established, owned, or rented by their bank, even if the machines are in another State or otherwise outside their home bank's branching area. The bill also clearly authorizes national banks to share and permit their customers to use third-party ATM's, and, in effect, says that these activities would not constitute illegal branch banking.

Thus, this bill is preservative in nature, since it aims to preserve the legal status quo for ATM sharing which existed—unchallenged—between 1976 and 1984. To this end, the bill effectively codifies the regulations, rulings and interpretations of the Comptroller of the Currency upon which national banks have relied in joining ARM networks. By so doing, it would preserve national bank participation in the networks, and preserve the networks for the benefit of the American public. By clarifying, once and for all, the current uncertain legal situation, it would discourage unproductive litigation, and foster the future growth of networks.

4. WHY NOT WAIT FOR THE COURTS TO DECIDE?

Opponents of this bill last year contended that Congress should wait for the appeals court to decide the Marine Midland case. Why not wait for the appeals court?

The Marine Midland case has created severe uncertainty in the EFT industry. As Mastercard's witness told the Banking Committee, the ruling "threatens the legal integrity" of existing ATM networks because it "casts serious doubt on the judicial precedents and regulatory policies which have been relied upon in the development of shared ATM networks. Specifically, if upheld, the decision would effectively prohibit national bank participation in intrastate shared networks.

Several witnesses, including the EFT Association and the Comptroller, have testified that this uncertainty has already created a chilling effect on the development of new ATM networks, because it increases the risk of investment or through adverse court action.

This uncertainty serves no public purpose; it merely deprives the public of additional, convenient and popular banking services.

And, of course, the appeals court may uphold the Marine Midland decision. Even opponentsdland by the prestigious Second Circuit Appeals Court could lead to other suits which might lead the Comptroller to withdraw his regulation stating that shared ATM's are not branches. If so, effects would spread nationwide. Affirmation would certainly encourage protectionist groups to file additional suits in order to reduce competition.

Of course, the second circuit might overturn the Marine decision. But that might not definitively resolve the question of whether a shared ATM is a national bank's further uncertainty. In these cases, inaction by Congress would simply retard development of beneficial ATM systems.

Keep in mind that shared networks have existed, unchallenged, for a long time. The witness from the Electronic Funds Transfer Association was right when he stated it was "wasteful, disruptive, inefficient, and patently unfair to change the rules of the game at this late date."

Finally, the Marine ruling is so broad—because it defines "branch" functionally—that it could have a number of totally unexpected consequences. For example, witnesses noted that "any retail outlet that honored a bank credit or debit card or cashed customer checks" might be considered a branch of a bank whose customers used it. This possibility injects substantial uncertainty into the relatively new point-of-sale systems as the EFTA noted. Banking via the mail, over the telephone, or by home computer, might all be considered illegal branch banking. This legislation would avoid these absurd results.

5. CONCLUSION

Mr. President, Congress needs to act to dispel this uncertainty, and to preserve and foster shared ATM networks for the benefit of American consumers. My bill does the job. I urge my colleagues to support it. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and an explanation be printed directly after my statement.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPLANATION OF THE BANKING CONVENIENCE ACT

The Federal McFadden Act (12 U.S.C. 36) defines a national bank's branch as a place of business where "deposits are received, or checks paid, or money lent". The act also states that a national bank may establish such a branch "at any point within the State in which (the bank) is located, if such establishment and operation are at the same time authorized to State banks by the statute laws of the State in question . . . and subject to the restrictions as to location imposed by the law of the State on State Banks."

By its terms, the McFadden Act limits intrastate branching by national banks. A national bank may branch within its home State only to the extent that the State's law permits branching by State banks.

Further, McFadden does not authorize national banks to establish branches across State lines, and it is generally interpreted to prohibit interstate branching.

In short, the McFadden Act limits intrastate branching by national banks and prohibits interstate branching.

During the early development of electronic funds transfer, the comptroller of the currency, the principal regulator of national banks, took the position that automated teller machines (ATM's) were never branches of national banks.

This view was challenged successfully in the case of Independent Banks Association of America v. Smith (1976) ("Smith"). The Smith court held that if a banks customers use an ATM to conduct banking transactions and if the ATM is also "established (i.e., owned or rented)" by the bank, then the ATM is a branch of the national bank under McFadden, and its location is restricted by the McFadden Act and State branching laws.

The Smith decision definitively resolved the status of ATM's owned or rented by national banks. Since Smith, such ATM's have been considered branches established by the bank, and their location is restricted.

The Smith ruling also implicitly resolved the question of shared ATM's—ATM's established by one financial institution but used by the customers of another. Smith implied that an ATM which is neither owned nor rented by a national bank is not a branch established by the bank under McFadden, even if the bank's customers use the ATM to communicate with their home bank.

Following this reasoning, a national bank's customers could use a third party ATM located where the bank itself could not branch: such customer use would not involve illegal branch banking by the national bank.

Since 1976, the Comptroller has consistently followed the Smith ruling. In rulings, interpretive letters, and a final regulation (12 CFR 5.31(b), 1981), the Comptroller has held that an ATM is to be considered a branch for purposes of the McFadden Act if the national bank establishes the ATM by owning or renting it; but the ATM is not a branch if the bank's customers merely use the ATM and the bank does not own or rent it.

Since 1976, national banks have relied on the Comptroller's actions with respect to shared ATM's in order to participate in nationwide, regional and intrastate networks of shared ATM's, secure in the knowledge that what they were doing was legal. National banks have permitted their customers to use many ATM's located across State lines and in other areas where they could not branch because of the Smith Case and the Comptroller's assurances that mere use of a third party ATM by their customers did not constitute illegal branch banking.

This legal basis for far-flung ATM networks was shaken early in 1984 by a New York District Court. In the case of Independent Bankers' Association of New York v. Marine Midland Bank ("Marine Midland"), the court rejected both the Comptroller's regulation and the Smith decision as they applied to shared ATM's.

In essence, the Marine Midland court stated that mere use of a shared ATM by a national bank's customers transforms the ATM into a national bank branch for McFadden purposes. Specifically, the court found that if a national bank's customers used an ATM to conduct banking transactions with their home bank, then the ATM is a branch even if the national bank does not establish, own or rent it.

Should this mere use doctrine become the law of the land, national banks could not continue to participate in many of the existing ATM networks. Participation would lead to customer use of ATM's located where the banks themselves could not branch, and this would be illegal branch banking. National bank customers could no longer use an ATM in another State. Nor could they use certain in-State ATM's, if they lived in a State with limited intrastate branching. Existing shared ATM networks would contract or disappear, as national bank participation diminished.

The "Banking Convenience Act" overturns the Marine Midland ruling, and codifies the Comptroller's regulation and interpretation of the Smith decision, in order to preserve the existing shared ATM networks and to allow new networks to develop under the familiar rules.

The bill effectively divides ATM's and similar "automated devices" into two classes—those which are established by national banks and those which are not so established. The former would be branches under McFadden, the latter would not.

The bill also provides a test to determine when a national bank has established an ATM. Following the Comptroller's regulation, the bill states that an automated device is established by a national bank only if it is owned or rented by that bank. If the device is neither owned nor rented by a national bank, it is not a branch established by that bank.

In addition, the bill explicitly authorizes a national bank to "share or permit its customers to use an automated device which is not established by the Bank."

The effect of these provisions is as follows.

If an ATM is owned or rented by a national bank, it would be considered a branch established by the bank for McFadden purposes (provided it is also a place where "deposits are received, or checks paid, or money lent"). As a branch, its location would be restricted by pertinent State branching law.

Other ATM's, neither established, owned, nor rented by national banks, would not be considered branches established by national banks whose customers use them. Their location would not be restricted, through the McFadden Act, by State branching laws. This exemption from McFadden would allow national banks in shared ATM networks to continue to provide customer access to ATM's anywhere in the country without fear of charges of illegal branch banking.

In exempting shared ATM's used by national bank customers from the definition of branch under McFadden, the bill does not eliminate all restrictions on ATM's. However, the restrictions that apply would be restrictions applicable to the owner/establisher of the ATM, not to the national bank whose customers use it. Thus, if the customers of national bank A use an ATM owned by national bank B, the ATM would not be bank A's branch, but it would still be bank B's branch. As such, its location would continue to be subject to the branching laws of B's State.

Thus, the bill in no way diminishes the requirement that every ATM be strictly legally located in accordance with laws applicable to its owner/establisher.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Banking Convenience Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 5155 of the Revised Statutes (12 U.S.C. 36) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(i)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, a national bank may share, or permit its customers to use, an automated device that is not established by that bank, and such automated device shall not be considered a branch of that bank within the meaning of subsection (f) of this section.

"(2) For the purpose of this subsection—

"(A) an automated device is established by a national bank only if it is owned or rented by that bank;

"(B) an automated device is not established by a national bank if the bank is assessed transactional fees or similar charges for its use; and

"(C) the term 'automated device' includes, without limitation, automated teller machines, customer bank communications terminals, point-of-sale terminals, and cash dispensing machines.".

S. 207. A bill concerning vandalism of religious property; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

VANDALISM OF RELIGIOUS PROPERTY

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise this afternoon to introduce legislation to combat the rising tide of anti-Semitism. Last Congress, I introduced similar legislation in response to the alarming number of atrocities against Jews and other religious and ethnic groups. I was pleased to see that this legislative proposal was included in the 252 "New Ideas" brought forth by House Republicans.

During 1984 alone, there were almost 1,100 acts of violence directed against members of the Jewish community reported to authorities. Hundreds more went unreported. According to a report issued by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, there were 715 incidents of anti-Semitic vandalism and other attacks against Jewish institutions, businesses, and homes.

In addition, there were more than 369 incidents of assault against individual Jews. These figures are an increase over 1983 levels and signify a potentially perilous trend in our society. These acts of violence include arson, bombing, and cemetery desecration.

We must take action to increase public awareness of the threat which these acts of bigotry pose, not only to the Jewish Community, but to the general public as well. At the same time, we must increase the penalties for those who perpetrate such vicious acts. To date, 16 States, including Arizona, California, Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Virginia, and Washington have enacted statutes dealing with religious or ethnic vandalism. While I commend these efforts, additional measures are needed.

Accordingly, I am introducing legislation today to impose stiff new Federal penalties for those who commit acts of religious violence or vandalism. My proposal would establish a series of graduated penalties for those convicted of such acts. These penalties would include heavy fines and stiff prison sentences for these individuals.

I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort designed to effectively deal with those who commit acts of religious violence or vandalism.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this legislation be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks in its entirety.

Thank you, Mr. President.

S. 209. A bill to amend chapter 37 of title 31, United States Code, to authorize contracts retaining private counsel to furnish collection services in the case of indebtedness owed the United States; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

CONTRACTS FOR COLLECTION OF DEBTS OWED THE UNITED STATES

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill that would enable the Federal Government to retain private law firms in connection with the recovery of the vast amounts of delinquent debt now owed it. This bill is intended to supercede S. 143, a draft bill on the same subject, which was introduced on January 3, 1985.

The bill I am introducing today is exactly the same as S. 1668 which was passed by the 98th Congress on July 25, 1984. The language contained in S. 143 reflects an earlier version of this legislation, which was subsequently refined and amended before its passage by the Senate as S. 1668.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed in its entirety in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 209

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Debt Recovery Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 3718 of title 31, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out subsection (d);

(2) by redesignating subsections (b) and (c) as subsections (d) and (e), respectively;

(3) in subsection (d), as redesignated by paragraph (2), by inserting "or (b)" after "subsection (a)"

(4) in subsection (e), as redesignated by paragraph (2), by striking out "(b)" and inserting in lieu therof "(d)"; and

(5) by inserting after subsection (a) the following new subsection:

"(b)(1) The Attorney General may make contracts retaining private counsel to furnish legal services, including representation in negotiation, compromise, settlement, and litigation, in the case of any claim of indebtedness owed the United States. If the Attorney General makes a contract for legal services to be furnished in any judicial district of the United States under the first sentence, the Attorney General shall use his best efforts to retain, from among attorneys regularly engaged in the private practice of law in such district, more than one private counsel to furnish such legal services in such district. Each such contract shall include such terms and conditions as the Attorney General considers necessary and appropriate, including a provision specifying the amount of the fee to be paid to the private counsel under such contract or the method for calculating that fee. The amount of the fee payable for legal services furnished under any such contract may not exceed the fee that counsel engaged in the private practice of law in the area or areas where the legal services are furnished typically charge clients for furnishing legal services in the collection of claims of indebtedness, as determined by the Attorney General, considering the amount, age, and nature of the indebtedness and whether the debtor is an individual or a business entity.

"(2) The head of an executive or legislative agency may refer to a private counsel retained under paragraph (1) of this subsection claims of indebtedness owed the United States arising out of activities of that agency.

"(3) Notwithstanding sections 516, 518(b), 519, and 547(2) of title 28, a private counsel retained under paragraph (1) of this subsection may represent the United States in litigation in connection with legal services furnished pursuant to the contract entered into with that counsel under paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(4) A contract made with a private counsel under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall include—

"(A) a provision permitting the Attorney General to terminate the contract if the Attorney General finds that termination of the contract is in the public interest;

"(B) a provision permitting the Attorney General to have any claim referred under the contract returned to the Attorney General if the Attorney General finds such action to be in the public interest;

"(C) a provision permitting the head of any executive or legislative agency which refers a claim under the contract to resolve a dispute regarding the claim, to compromise the claim, or to terminate a collection action on the claim; and

"(D) a provision requiring the private counsel to transmit monthly to the Attorney General and the head of the executive or legislative agency referring a claim under the contract a report on the services relating to the claim rendered under the contract during the month and the progress made during the month in collecting the claim under the contract.

"(5) Notwithstanding the fourth sentence of section 803(6) of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (15 U.S.C. 1692a(6)), a private counsel performing legal services pursuant to a contract made under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be considered a debt collector for the purposes of such Act.

"(c)(1) The Attorney General shall transmit to the Congress an annual report on the activities of the Department of Justice to recover indebtedness owed the United States which was referred to the Department of Justice for collection. Each such report shall include a list, by agency, of the total number and amounts of collected and uncollected claims of indebtedness which were referred to the Department of Justice for collection, shall separately specify any uncollected claim of indebtedness which was covered by a contract (A) which was terminated by the Attorney General under subsection (b)(4)(A) of this section or (B) under which the claim was returned to the Attorney General under subsection (b)(4)(B) of this section, and shall describe the progress made by the Department of Justice in collecting uncollected claims of indebtedness during the one-year period covered by the report.

"(2)(A) The Comptroller General of the United States shall carry out an annual audit of the actions taken by the Attorney General under subsection (b) of this section during the preceding twelve months. The Comptroller General shall determine the extent to which there is competition among private counsel to obtain contracts awarded under such subsection, the reasonableness of the fees provided in such contracts, the diligence and efforts of the Attorney General to retain counsel in accordance with the provisions of this section, and the results of the debt collection efforts of private counsel retained under such contracts.

"(B) After completing each audit under subparagraph (A), the Comptroller General shall transmit to the Congress a report on the findings and conclusions resulting from the audit.".

SEC. 3. Not later than sixty days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Attorney General of the United States shall transmit to the Congress a report on the actions taken under section 3718(b) of title 31, United States Code (as added by paragraph (5) of section 2 of this Act).●

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself and Mr. LONG):

S. 210. A bill to repeal the inclusion of tax-exempt interest from the calculation determining the taxation of Social Security benefits; to the Committee on Finance.

CONCERNING TAXATION OF SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to reintroduce legislation that would repeal the inclusion of tax-exempt interest when calculating gross income for purposes of the taxation of Social Security benefits. This bill is identical to legislation I introduced in the 98th Congress, S. 1113. I am pleased to be joined by the ranking member of the Finance Committee, Senator LONG, who was instrumental in fighting for S. 1113 last Congress.

S. 1113 became necessary as a result of an unconstitutional provision included in the Social Security Amendments of 1983. This omnibus legislation established the first ever tax on Social Security benefits. The legislation mandated an income threshold of $25,000—$32,000 for a married couple filing jointly—for taxation of Social Security benefits. Included in the threshold calculation are taxable earnings, half of all Social Security benefits, and all tax-exempt interest income.

I feel strongly that inclusion of tax-exempt interest in the income threshold represents the first-ever Federal tax on tax-exempt interest. This is an unconstitutional infringement on the operations of State and local government.

An overwhelming majority of the Senate supported S. 1113. The bill had 25 cosponsors in the 98th Congress. On April 14, 1984, Senator LONG and I raised S. 1113 as an amendment to the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984. The amendment passed by a vote of 63 to 32. To a great extent, the amendment passed because of the efforts of Senator LONG. I believe that Senator LONG's persuasive and cogent arguments made on the Senate floor paved the way toward Senate passage of the amendment.

Unfortunately, the amendment was dropped by the conference committee. Apparently, there was little House support for the amendment among the conferees.

The Municipal Finance Officers Association [MFOA] has estimated that the inclusion of tax-exempt interest in the calculation for determining the taxation of Social Security benefits has raised municipal borrowing rates by 25 to 50 basis points. This will cost State and local government between $299 to $598 million nationwide. This is a disaster of immense proportions.

Who would pay the added interest costs? How are municipal expenses recovered? From one source and one source only: State and local taxpayers will foot the bill. And, to the extent that electric utilities issue pollution control bonds via municipalities, ratepayers will pay the added costs. The intolerable result is that individuals will pay once through higher utility bills and again through increased taxes. Can we in good conscience raise taxes and utility bills?

Municipalities do have an alternative to raising taxes: They can reduce capital outlays. This, of course, would lead to a further deterioration of existing city and State services. In this case, local leadership must make the painful choice of deciding the essential city service that must be trimmed. In most major cities, police, fire, and school services cannot be cut further without endangering the public well-being. As it is, these essential services are operating on a shoestring. Is it worth jeopardizing the safety of our citizens in the name of raising a mere pittance for the Treasury? Who in this Chamber desires to reduce the educational opportunities available to our young people?

The legislation introduced today, Mr. President, will eliminate a burden that also will be borne by the middle-income elderly of our society. The provision states that in determining gross income for purposes of taxing Social Security benefits, total taxable income is added to tax-exempt interest plus half of the Social Security benefits received. If this figure is over $25,000—$32,000 for a married couple—then half the amount of the individual's Social Security benefits over the threshold is added to taxable income and taxed at his or her marginal tax rate. For example, if a person has $20,000 of pension income, no tax-exempt income, and $10,000 of Social Security benefits, adjusted gross income would be $25,000. Given this, Social Security benefits would not be taxed.

However, if this same individual has $20,000 of pension income, $5,000 of tax-exempt income, $10,000 of Social Security benefits, then adjusted gross income would be $30,000. In this case, $650 of tax would be paid on the Social Security benefits over $25,000, or $2,250. The interest-free income of $5,000 pushed adjusted gross income over the threshold level. This amounts to a tax on tax-exempt income. As it stands now, there exists a tremendous incentive for the middle class to sell their municipal or State bonds and buy higher yielding taxable securities. Existing legislation punishes middle-class retirees for investing their savings in the cities in which they reside. Where will cities obtain funds if their own residents will not invest?

In another example, a married couple with $27,000 of pension income, $1,000 of tax-free interest, and $10,000 of Social Security benefits would have adjusted gross income of $33,000. This figure is $1,000 over the $32,000 threshold established for a married couple only because of the inclusion of tax-exempt income. The resulting tax on Social Security benefits is $145. This amounts to a 14.5-percent marginal tax rate on previously tax-free bonds. Only an idiot would consciously pay tax on a supposed tax-free security. Mr. President, our Nation's elderly should not be responsible to a greater degree than other citizens for reducing the Federal budget deficit.

People who put their life savings in municipal bonds already are absorbing a 2½-percentage-point reduction in yield. The spread between AA-rated municipal bonds and similar quality corporate bonds is running today at 262 basis points. Municipal bond investors thus sacrifice a 28-percent reduction in yield by not buying taxable securities. We are now imposing on these same elderly citizens up to an additional 15-percent reduction in return, for a total penalty of 43 percent. What is going to be the impact of this ugly tax? These same investors, already overburdened by taxes, will exert their collective economic muscle and sell municipal bonds. And who could blame them. Cities and States will be denied the necessary financing for essential services. Police, fire, and water facilities will deteriorate for lack of funding. We will be the ones responsible unless this disgraceful provision is stricken. The Members of Congress must act to protect city and State services, lower property taxes, and maintain the financial integrity of local government.

In essence, Mr. President, current legislation will tax previously sacrosanct—since 1913—State and municipal bonds. Furthermore, this will only impact middle-class retirees near the gross income threshold. The wealthy will not be dealt any penalty. A single person or married couple with $100,000 of taxable income will pay taxes on half their Social Security benefits regardless of the amount of State or municipal bond interest they earn. There is no equity in the current system. Why punish the old lady barely making ends meet and let the rich off easy?

It has been estimated by the Joint Committee on Taxation that only a scant $5 million over 7 years will be raised by this ridiculous provision. It is my belief that even this tiny amount is overstated. Let us look at an example of an unmarried individual with pension income of $25,000 and tax-free interest income of $500 for total gross income of $25,500. Rather than pay tax on Social Security benefits, this person will sell his bonds that are currently priced at a discount and take a principal loss. In this way gross income would be reduced to $25,000 and taxes otherwise paid on Social Security benefits would be eliminated. But by selling a bond at a discount, taxable income is reduced and Federal revenues depleted. Mr. President, the Treasury would actually lose money.

Quite frankly, Mr. President, I question the ability of the IRS to keep track of most individuals' tax-exempt interest income. Most currently outstanding municipal bonds are in bearer form and thus difficult to trace. The IRS would be virtually powerless to deter people who decided not to report their tax-free income. In an effort to recover these few dollars, the IRS would have to add further detail to existing tax forms. I see no reason to further complicate what is already an unfathomable situation.

I have serious doubts whether the IRS can simplify this highly complicated provision. The average taxpayer will not be able to comprehend it. More likely than not, the honest individual will unknowingly fill the required form out wrong. Is all this worth doing for no additional revenues? The answer is unequivocally no.

Finally, the inclusion of tax-free interest in calculating the threshold for taxation of Social Security benefits is nothing more than taxing municipal bonds. This, Mr. President, is unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has consistently held that the Federal Government cannot, under the Constitution, impair State and local borrowing power. Precedent was established back in 1894 in Pollack versus Farmers Loan & Trust Co. Actually there were two Pollack decisions: The first invalidated portions of the 1894 income tax law that included the taxation of State and local bond interest income, the second opinion nullified the entire tax law under review.

The Supreme Court made it clear in the Pollack decisions that any infringement on State and local borrowing power is unconstitutional. Again, when the 16th amendment was taken up in Congress, taxation of previously tax-free bonds was promptly dismissed. Later, in 1923, congressional intent was clear in prohibiting taxation of municipal bonds. At that time, Congress considered a constitutional amendment to permit the taxation of tax-exempt interest income. The 1923 amendment was approved by the House but did not pass the Senate.

As previously stated, the inclusion of tax-exempt interest income in determining the threshold for taxing Social Security benefits would raise the cost of borrowing by municipalities up to 50 basis points. Clearly this would impair the ability of municipalities to raise money. It is also tantamount to a tax on State and local bond interest income. I see no reason to become embroiled in a serious constitutional question over an issue of marginal value. Allowing this provision to remain on the books would be a dangerous precedent.

In summary, Mr. President, the bill introduced today by Senator LONG and me would return some equity to Social Security reform. The middle-class aged of our society will heave a sigh of relief. So will the State and municipal governments across the Nation that would be forced to either raise money at a higher cost or defer capital improvements. As a result, all taxpayers will be relieved of further burgeoning State and local taxes. Moreover, a constitutional conflict will be avoided. All this will be accomplished without depriving the Treasury of needed revenues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation be printed in the RECORD in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 210

By Mr. PROXMIRE:

S. 211. A bill to amend the Agricultural Act of 1949 to extend the Milk Diversion Program and to remove the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to modify the price support rate for milk; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

MILK DIVERSION PROGRAM SHOULD CONTINUE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that will give new life to a program that is one of the true success stories of recent years—the Milk Diversion Program [MDP].

Before describing what my bill will do and why it merits widespread support, let me recount briefly recent dairy legislative history. What follows is a short summary of key dairy provisions of the Dairy and Tobacco Adjustment Act of 1983, which was signed into law by President Reagan on November 29, 1983.

Right off the bat, the new law lowered the dairy price support level from $13.10 per hundredweight to $12.60 per hundredweight. This cut became effective December 1, 1983, and continues through September 30, 1985.

Prior to the cut provided for in the new law, the dairy price support level had been frozen at $13.10 per hundredweight since October 1, 1980. From that date up to December 1, 1983, there was absolutely no increase in the price support level. During that period, of course, most costs facing dairy farmers climbed upward.

The new dairy law also required another 50-cent-per-hundredweight reduction—this one to come from the price of all milk sold from December 1, 1983, through March 31, 1985, with the money to be used by the Commodity Credit Corporation [CCC] to help pay for a dairy diversion program.

Under the paid diversion program established in the new law, a $10-per-hundredweight diversion payment goes to dairy farmers who cut production between 5 and 30 percent from an earlier base period.

I should point out that I supported then—and continue to support—the paid diversion concept for dairy farmers. That approach was, in fact, the cornerstone of the dairy bill which I introduced, along with others in the Wisconsin congressional delegation, in February of 1983.

But there was one major difference between my bill and the new dairy law. My bill was designed to go into effect no later than April 1, 1983, and expire on September 30, 1985. This would have provided a full 30 months for my plan—known as the Voluntary Incentive Program [VIP]—to work.

In contrast, the new dairy law created a paid diversion program that runs from January 1, 1984, through March 31, 1985, which is 15 months or exactly half the period that my bill called for.

There is another important—and, in my view, ill-conceived—provision in the Dairy and Tobacco Adjustment Act of 1983. Under the terms of this law, on April 1, 1985—the day after the paid diversion program ends—the dairy price support level may be cut another 50 cents per hundredweight if estimated annual CCC purchases exceed 6 billion pounds milk equivalent. And on July 1, 1985, dairy price supports may be cut by yet another 50 cents per hundredweight if estimated annual CCC purchases exceed 5 billion pounds milk equivalent.

Finally, the new law prescribed a mandatory assessment of 15 cents per hundredweight for dairy product promotion, research, and nutrition education while allowing up to 10-cents-per-hundredweight credit for qualifying State or regional promotion programs.

What does the legislation I am introducing today provide? Under the terms of my bill, a new 12-month paid diversion program would be available to all dairy producers—those now participating as well as all others—as of April 1, 1985. The current program, as noted earlier, ends on March 31, 1985. The terms and conditions of the new diversion program, including its voluntary nature, would be the same as those of the current program.

There are several compelling reasons why my bill establishes a 12-month program—from April 1, 1985, to March 31, 1986. Many dairy farmers, especially those not a part of the original program, would not be interested in signing up for a shorter time period. By providing for a 1-year program, I hope to stimulate greater participation by producers. In addition, the diversion program we have now is a rousing success. A full year of further reductions in our dairy surplus and the related taxpayer expenditures for buying and storing it strikes me as very sound public policy.

And finally, there is no guarantee that the 1985 farm bill, with whatever new dairy program it may contain, will be passed by the Congress and signed into law by the target date of October 1, 1985. One need only recall that two of the last four farm bills—all with the same hoped for enactment date of October 1—were not signed into law until after October 1. And the 1981 farm bill, the most recent one, did not become law until December 22 of that year. A 12-month diversion program helps ensure predictability and continuity in our Federal dairy policy. Those drafting the 1985 farm bill can simply take into account the new diversion program provided for in my bill and hopefully enacted into law well before April 1, 1985.

My bill contains one more vital provision: It eliminates the authority in current law for further price support cuts on April 1 and July 1 of this year. Our present diversion program is working without these additional price support cuts. The same would be true for the new program set forth in my bill. More price support cuts in 1985 would only hurt dairy farmers while helping no one else.

Why do I say the current Milk Diversion Program is working and fully justifies a second life of another 12 months that my bill would make possible? Mr. President, the evidence is overwhelming.

The Milk Diversion Program was designed to bring about reductions in three related areas: First, milk production; second, CCC purchases; and third, Federal Government costs. It has met these objectives with flying colors. Consider the following facts.

Milk production during calendar year 1983 reached a record 140 billion pounds, an increase of 3.1 percent, 4.2 billion pounds, over 1982. In each quarter of 1983, milk production was marked by year-over-year increases of approximately 3 percent. But production in each of the first three quarters of 1984 was lower than the corresponding period for 1983, with July-September 1984 down 3.9 percent compared to the year-earlier figure and almost 1 percent below the third quarter of 1982.

Lower milk production has translated into reduced CCC purchases. For calendar year 1984, it is estimated that CCC net purchases will total about 8.5 billion pounds in contrast to the 1983 figure of 16.8 billion pounds. Talk about getting the job done—clearly, this is it.

But wait, there's more. Using data on a calendar-year basis can be somewhat misleading. The diversion program did not go into effect until January 1, 1984. January was the sign up month for producers and little reduction in milk production was taking place during that time. Remember, too, that 1984 was a leap year and the additional day in February meant more milk production.

What this means is that the success of the Milk Diversion Program in bringing about reduced CCC purchases is seen even more dramatically when one compares those purchases during April through September of 1984 with the corresponding period in 1983. That comparison is as follows:

April-September 1984 as percent of April-September 1983

Product:
Butter	25.1
American cheese	55.3
Nonfat dry milk	62.3

For September, the following comparison can be made:

September 1984 as percent of September 1983

Product:
Butter
American cheese	18.9
Nonfat dry milk	44.6

From the beginning, October 1, 1984, of the 1984-85 marketing year through December 28, 1984, the comparison reveals the following:

1984-85 as percent of 1983-84

Product:
Butter	19.6
American cheese	26.8
Nonfat dry milk	50.0

On a milk equivalent, fat solids basis, CCC purchases from October 1, 1984, through December 28, 1984, are 24.5 percent of the same period a year ago.

What does this spectacular record of reducing CCC purchases mean in terms of lower Federal costs for the dairy program? Mr. President, here again, the outcome demonstrates the total effectiveness of the Milk Diversion Program in meeting its aims.

A final breakdown of CCC costs for the Dairy Price Support Program for the 1983-84 marketing year, which corresponds to fiscal year 1984, is not yet available. But reliable estimates indicate that net program outlays for the 1983-84 marketing year will be about $1.5 billion. This includes product purchases, storage, transportation, and other costs and also reflects receipts from sales and transfers during the year. The comparable figure for the 1982-83 marketing year, fiscal year 1983, exceeds $2.5 billion. A claim of a $1 billion cost reduction is fully supportable. By any definition, this is a super cost turnaround. And the Milk Diversion Program was the prime factor in cutting these Government costs by a billion dollars—in fact, a little more than that—in fiscal year 1984 even though it was operational for only 9 months during that period.

One more crucial point about the Milk Diversion Program deserves special mention. The diversion payments made to producers who reduce marketings are funded to the tune of 90 to 95 percent by the 50-cent-per-hundredweight assessment levied on all milk marketed by dairy farmers. This is a self-help program in the fullest sense of the term.

Let me again also remind my colleagues that the Milk Diversion Program is wholly voluntary. Individual producers are free to choose whether or not to participate.

Has the consumer suffered in any way as a result of the Milk Diversion Program? Absolutely not. Retail dairy prices are expected to average about 253.3—1967 equaled 100—for 1984, an increase of 1.4 percent over 1983. Estimates are that retail prices for all foods in 1984 will average approximately 4 percent higher. Retail price projections for 1985 include the following: Dairy products, unchanged to 2 percent higher; all food items, 2 to 5 percent higher; and all retail items, 3 to 7 percent higher.

Mr. President, what happens if we do not have a new Milk Diversion Program in place as of April 1, 1985? We run the serious risk of dairy farmers beginning to produce more in an effort just to stay even. This, in turn, opens the way to increasing CCC purchases and rising taxpayer expenditures.

For this Senator, the choice is clear. Go with a proven success. The Milk Diversion Program should continue. The Senate should act—and act promptly—to pass my bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of my bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 212. A bill to make permanent the prohibition of credit card surcharges; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

PROHIBITION OF CREDIT CARD SURCHARGES

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to impose a permanent ban on credit card surcharges. I introduced identical legislation in the 98th Congress. The House approved a permanent ban on credit card surcharges in 1984. However, the Senate supported the imposition of surcharges on the use of credit cards and eliminates the opportunity for cash discounts.

Action on this issue in the 98th Congress was based on a flawed Federal Reserve study which assumed that cash customers subsidize those using credit cards. Nowhere did that study compare, or even recognize, the costs to merchants of accepting other means of payment such as cash or checks.

In addition, the study did not consider the effect credit card use has on the volume of sales and the resulting economies of scale realized by merchants—savings which reduce the cost of all goods and services to consumers. I have addressed both of the faults of the Fed study, at length, during previous debates on this issue and, therefore, I will not belabor them today. This does not mean, however, that the inadequacies of this study are any less glaring.

The cash discount system has provided, for over a decade, ample opportunity for merchants to pass on any costs of credit card use to those who actually use credit cards. Tampering with this system will be yet another example of Congress trying to fix something that is not broken.

It is my firm belief that credit card surcharges will penalize the 7 out of 10 American consumers who carry one or more of the 600 million credit cards now in circulation in the United States. These consumers value the convenience and security of credit cards, which are often used by middle-income Americans to budget, over a period of time, payment for necessary goods and services or, perhaps, an occasional luxury item. These people should not be slapped with a surcharge, which is no more than an inflationary penalty, returning no value to consumers whatsoever.

Consumers across America are rallying for Congress to enact a permanent surcharge ban. I urge you to hear the call of the American consumer by cosponsoring this permanent ban legislation. With your support, we may be able to quickly revisit the surcharge issue, either independently or as an addendum to other legislation pending in the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my legislation be reprinted in the RECORD in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

Thank you, Mr. President.

S.J. Res. 17. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation designating April 21 through April 28, 1985 as "Jewish Heritage Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JEWISH HERITAGE WEEK

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, as Americans, we can be proud of the diverse culture which we share. The richness of our cultural heritage results from the ideals and values brought to our shores by people of many races and religions.

Among these immigrants, members of the Jewish community contributed significantly to the spiritual and cultural growth of our Nation. These individuals, along with their descendents, have brought distinction and honor to every field of endeavor, including the arts, humanities, and sciences. Our Jewish citizens have fought and died to preserve and protect the freedom for which this great country stands.

The Jewish people cherish a tradition and a culture which spans the course of many thousands of years. Their perseverance through the many tests of time has made the Jewish community a vital asset to the United States.

During each spring, Jews throughout the United States and around the world observe a number of significant dates. Beginning with the observance of Passover, which commemorates their passage from bondage to freedom, along with the observance of the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising and concluding with the celebration of Israeli Independence Day, American Jews rededicate themselves to the concepts of liberty, equality, and democracy.

In recognition of the untold contributions of Jews, who have become an integral part of the American heritage, I am introducing the following resolution requesting that the President designate April 21 through April 28, 1985, as "Jewish Heritage Week." I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsorship of this important resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 17

Whereas the Congress recognizes that an understanding of the heritage of all American ethnic groups contributes to the unity of our country; and

Whereas intergroup understanding can be further fostered through an appreciation of the culture, history, and traditions of the Jewish community and the contributions of Jews to our country and society; and

Whereas the months of March, April, and May contain events of major significance in the Jewish calendar—Passover, the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, Israeli Independence Day, Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry, and Jerusalem Day: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating April 21 through April 28, 1985, as "Jewish Heritage Week" and calling upon the people of the United States, State and local government agencies, and interested organizations to observe that week with appropriate ceremonies, activities, and programs.●

By Mr. MATSUNAGA (for himself, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. SIMON):

S.J. Res. 18. Joint resolution relating to NASA and Cooperative Mars Exploration; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

COOPERATIVE MARS EXPLORATION

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a joint resolution pertaining to a distant planet that has fascinated the human species since our earliest ancestors first contemplated the heavens—Mars.

Some of my colleagues may wonder: Has the Senator from Hawaii lost his senses? Here the U.S. Senate convenes to address a veritable avalanche of pressing issues—tax reform, the deficit, defense spending, arms control, unemployment, crime, human rights, environmental regulation, Central America, Afghanistan, the Middle East, farm policy—and the Senator from Hawaii talks about Mars?

But Mr. President, I believe we also have a duty to try to see beyond the cascading issues that engulf us daily, even while we are considering them. No one likes to be called a reactionary, but if we simply react to problems as they occur, what else are we? Too often, it seems, harried policymakers only have time to consider the future when she has nothing to offer because the encroaching present has already violated her potential.

I don't accept that, Mr. President. I can't and I won't. I don't believe the American people sent us here only to respond to their immediate needs. I believe our constituents also hope that some day, perhaps, we will respond to their aspirations as well, and not merely by concluding our speeches with misty visions borrowed from greeting cards or uplifting quotes from folklore. The future is neither nostalgia nor a dream but an unfolding concrete reality, filled with promise, meant to be acted upon pragmatically now, with inteiligence and imagination, by those of us who are entrusted with the responsibilities of Government.

It is in that spirit, Mr. President, that I rise to introduce a joint resolution pertaining to the planet Mars, which I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD.

Mr. President, as the preambular clauses in my resolution indicate, the prospect of another costly and wasteful space race with the Soviets is anything but science fiction. At a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing last September 13, a panel of U.S. space scientists testified unanimously that the Soviets were going to Mars, perhaps as early as the 1990's. The evidence is convincing. The Soviets' record-setting achievements in long duration flight (nearly 8 months, most recently) can only be justified as preparation for an interplanetary mission, since space stations, including the one we are planning, are most efficiently serviced by rotating crews; whereas missions to the Moon can be completed in a few days. Similarly, the heavy-lift launch vehicle the Soviets are developing, which vastly exceeds our capabilities, is a requisite building block for manned interplanetary exploration. Other indications, including an already-scheduled unmanned mission to the Mars moon Phobos, plans for high-powered nuclear rocket engines, and numerous other activities and pronouncements by officials of the Soviet Government, point in the same direction. Are we setting ourselves up for another Sputnik? Many experts believe so.

We can, of course, wait characteristically until the last minute, then launch a crash program to beat the Soviets to Mars, at stupendous cost. And after that, Neptune? Pluto? The next galaxy? Even in the context of our selfperpetuating "real world" we cannot anticipate racing the Soviets into a cosmic infinity.

As the space age unfolds, it is generating new realities, and new opportunities, unlike any imaginable heretofore. Cosmic is no metaphor out there. Only fantasists talk about riding through space planting flags and defending trade routes with rocket ships. Realists recognize that the sheer immensity of space generates requirements for survival that, ultimately, will force the superpowers to cooperate. At a certain point, anything other than international exploration of the cosmos from our tiny planet will cease to make any sense at all. In our intense absorption with events of the moment, we have failed to recognize how close to that point we really are.

But before we can reach it, we must develop policies that respond to the unfolding realities of the space age, that move out to meet it on its own uniquely promising terms. Without such policies, earthbound civilization can only wind up recoiling upon itself. It is not often remarked, Mr. President, that the so-called space weapons systems currently under development will reach scarcely above the atmosphere before turning and pointing their deadly cargo back down upon the Earth. Regardless of their merits, those systems are irrelevant to the challenge of space exploration. For that compelling reason alone, it is in our interest to develop a separate track for international space exploration, even as we negotiate with the Soviets at Geneva and strengthen our defenses at home. It would permit us to test a new context for political action without letting down our guard in the context which currently prevails. As it happens, the planet Mars offers an initial guiding step in that direction.

Toward the end of this decade an unusual convergence in space exploration will occur. In 1988, the U.S.S.R. will launch an unmanned scientific mission to the Mars moon Phobos. In 1990, the United States will launch its Mars Geochemical/Climatology Orbiter. It makes no sense not to coordinate the two scheduled missions, so as to insure maximum scientific return. But, due to long lead times for such activities, meaningful cooperation cannot be achieved unless action is taken within the next few months. My resolution proposes that the President direct the Administrator of NASA to explore the opportunities for coordinating the two Mars missions while there is still time, in the context of the administration's committed effort to renew the U.S.-U.S.S.R. space cooperation agreement in accordance with legislation the President signed last October 30. Due to the time sensitiveness and the technical complexities involved, it is entirely fitting that NASA take on this responsibility, in consultation with the Department of State. Coordinating the 1988 and 1990 Mars missions—which would require no technology transfer on either side—represents an opportunity that deserves the highest priority. Among other things, it could open the way to a wider range of cooperative activities in other areas of space science, such as solar-terrestrial physics, astrophysics and plasma physics. And, of course, it would set the stage for further collaboration in the exploration of Mars.

With the preceding in mind, my resolution also proposes that NASA prepare a report examining the opportunities for joint East-West Mars-related activities, including an unmanned sample return and all other activities that might contribute to an international manned mission to Mars, perhaps at the turn of the century. I should point out, Mr. President, that Mars contingency planning is nothing new at NASA. My resolution notes that the original target of American space planners was the planet Mars—not the Moon, which the White House decided upon for political reasons—and that Mars was subsequently advanced as a logical follow-up to the Apollo Moon Program, but this time it was rejected for budgetary reasons. Designs for Mars missions have been percolating on NASA's backburners for 25 years. I understand that even now NASA may be gearing up for yet another manned Mars mission study, in keeping with the President's admirable intention to establish goals beyond the space station that will carry us well into the next century. In effect, my resolution suggests that such a study also encompass the possibilities for U.S.-U.S.S.R. cooperation, so we can at least consider that option alongside the alternative of an absurdly wasteful U.S.-U.S.S.R. race to Mars, while we still have a choice.

In sum, Mr. President, my resolution does two things. On the one hand, it urges policymakers to exploit an immediate opportunity for space cooperation. On the other hand, it casts that opportunity in the context of requirements generated by an almost unimaginably expansive new age that promises to render many aspects of current thought and action obsolete, if we manage to keep human civilization intact long enough to enter it. I hope we will devote greater consideration to devising ways to take advantage of those uniquely promising opportunities on the horizon, even as we now stand on the brink. If successful, we will earn the gratitude of future generations—indeed, of whole new worlds.

Mr. President, for all those reasons, and others which I have enumerated elsewhere, I believe the U.S. Congress has a duty to include in its deliberations joint peaceful exploration of space, beginning with the planet Mars.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Hawaii yield?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. First, Mr. President, I ask permission of the Senator from Hawaii to be cosponsor of this resolution.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I am happy to have the Senator join.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I want to congratulate the Senator from Hawaii on this resolution, an excellent resolution.

It is a way of proceeding in space economically, saving enormous sums of money, No. 1, cooperating with the Soviet Union in a way that is constructive and positive, and in a way that can help us work in the direction of peace.

Then there is one other element that I think we ignore. That is if we do these things internationally, I would hope the Senator could also eventually broaden this to include other nations—Japan, West Germany, France, and so forth. To the extent we do this, it ratifies what we are doing in space. None of us in this body or in the House of Representatives is expert enough to evaluate these programs. If other countries will put their hard money into it, I think it is an indication that these programs are useful.

Certainly, as Carl Sagan has said, this kind of activity has no military implications, only peaceful implications, enormous implications for the future.

What the Senator is proposing today makes a great deal of sense from the standpoint of peace, economy, and proceeding with programs that are scientifically valid. I congratulate him.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the Sentator from Wisconsin for his comments, especially in the light of the fact, an accepted truth, that he has been the watchdog of the Federal Treasury, of Federal expenditures. For him to join and to make the statement he just made is truly a big boost to the prospect of the passage of my joint resolution. I am happy to include him as a cosponsor.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 18

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, Whereas President Reagan has called upon NASA to develop concrete goals beyond the space station that "will carry us well into the next century";

Whereas the original objective of United States space planners in the 1950's was the planet Mars, but it was replaced by a lunar mission for political reasons;

Whereas in 1969, members of a Presidential task force again recommended a manned Mars mission as a logical follow-up to the successful Apollo program, with that mission to be launched from a space station, but it was rejected for bugetary reasons;

Whereas a manned Mars mission is within the reach of existing technology and could be carried out at an estimated one-half of the cost of the Apollo program in constant dollars;

Whereas the U.S.S.R. has made known that Mars is the objective of its manned space program;

Whereas recent Soviet successes in long duration space flight and Soviet development of a heavy-lift launch vehicle that far exceeds United States capabilities have been accompanied by authoritative reports that the Soviets are actively preparing for a manned Mars mission, for perhaps as early as the 1990s;

Whereas a U.S.-U.S.S.R. race to Mars would involve massive wasteful expenditures and redundancies that would be contrary to the best interests of all parties concerned;

Whereas Mars exploration is of immense scientific and social significance but without significance in terms of space weapons development;

Whereas the United States and the U.S.S.R. have scheduled unmanned scientific missions to Mars for this decade, but those missions have not yet been coordinated to insure maximum scientific return;

Whereas on October 30, 1984, the President signed a resolution passed unanimously by both Houses of Congress calling for renewal of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. space cooperation agreement that was allowed to lapse in 1982: Now therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the sense of the Congress that the President, as part of his committed effort to renegotiate the U.S.-U.S.S.R. space cooperation agreement, should direct the Administrator of NASA, in consultation with the Secretary of State, to:

(1) explore the opportunities for cooperation on an already-scheduled Soviet mission to the Mars moon Phobos in 1988 and an already-scheduled United States Mars Geochemical/Climatology Orbiter mission in 1990, to insure maximum scientific return from both missions;

(2) prepare a report, in association with nongovermental space scientists, examining the opportunities for joint East-West Mars-related activitives, including an unmanned Mars sample return and all activities that might contribute to an international manned mission to Mars;

(3) submit to the Congress at the earliest practicable date, but no later than October 1, 1985, a report detailing the steps taken in carrying out paragraphs (1) and (2).

SENATE RESOLUTION 40—RELATING TO TERMINATION OF DEFENSE AND SECURITY TREATIES

Mr. GOLDWATER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 40

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that, consistent with the role of the Senate in the making of treaties and the advice and consent power of the Senate under article II, section 2, clause 2 of the United States Constitution, and in order to improve the effectiveness of treaties to which the United States is a party and to uphold the reputation of the United States as a treaty partner, the United States shall not be considered as having terminated or withdrawn from any defense or security treaty, unless—

(1) the Senate has given its advice and consent, or both Houses of the Congress have agreed, to such termination or withdrawal, or

(2) such treaty or the resolution of ratification of such treaty specifically provides that the President acting alone may determine for the United States that such treaty is terminated.

SEC. 2. It is further the sense of the Senate that whenever the President—

(1) gives notice, on behalf of the United States, to any foreign government, foreign entity or international organization, of an intention to terminate or withdraw from any defense or security treaty to which the United States is a party, or

(2) determine that any such treaty has lapsed or expired, or been voided by breach of another party, or

(3) determines that the operation of any such treaty is inoperative or suspended with respect to the United States—

the President, as soon as practicable under the circumstances, should prepare and transmit to the President pro tempore of the Senate a report setting forth the substance of such notice or determination.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, once again I am introducing a resolution to put the Senate on record relative to the constitutional role which the framers intended this body to have in the termination of major treaties, especially treaties of mutual defense and military alliance. The measure accommodates the functions and interests of both the President and Senate.

The resolution expresses the position of the Senate that a formal defense or security treaty shall not be considered as having finally terminated under the laws of the United States at the initiative of our Nation, unless and until there is some manner of legislative participation in that decision.

The resolution recognizes that the President has a choice in seeking the manner of legislative action. He may ask the Senate to give its advice and consent to termination of a treaty which the Senate participated in making, or he may choose to ask both Houses of Congress to concur in or ratify his action.

Also, the resolution takes account of the possibility that the text of the treaty itself, or the resolution of ratification of a treaty, may specifically provide that the President acting alone is authorized to determine for the United States that the treaty is terminated. There are no such treaties now.

The second section of the resolution declares that the President should inform the Senate whenever he gives notice, on behalf of the United States, to any foreign government or entity or international body, of intention to terminate or withdraw from any defense or security treaty. In recognition of the fact that the great majority of treaties end by reason of actions taken by other governments, the resolution also states that the President should inform the Senate whenever he determines that a treaty has lapsed or expired, or become void. For example, a foreign government may inform us that it intends to end a treaty. Or, a treaty may expire by its own terms after its purposes have been fully satisfied. Or, it may become impossible to carry out the treaty because of changed international conditions.

Mr. President, I wish to emphasize that the resolution does not attempt to deny the President any constitutional authority he may possess to consider a treaty as having terminated in these circumstances. Also, the President can decide that a treaty is temporarily suspended. Obviously, there are situations where treaties cannot be given effect as black letter law, such as our present treaties with Iran or Cuba.

Moreover, I would especially call attention to the fact that nothing in the resolution denies the President an opportunity to decide that a treaty is no longer valid for the United States because there has been a serious violation by a treaty partner. One of the oldest principles of contract or treaty law is that a breach on one side discharges the other. In this situation, it is not the President who terminates the treaty for the United States. It has already been broken and terminated by another party.

If the evidence establishes, for example, that the Soviet Union has violated the 1972 Antiballistic Missile Treaty and the President determines that the violation imperils the national security, nothing in the resolution would deny the President authority to declare the treaty void, inoperative or suspended.

Rather, Mr. President, the basic purpose of the resolution is to address the rare but critical situation in which the Executive at his sole initiative decides to abrogate a treaty with a friendly, loyal treaty partner who wishes to keep the agreement alive.

My colleagues will remember that I first raised the issue of treaty termination when former President Carter abrogated the Mutual Defense Treaty with the Republic of China. His action was unprecedented in U.S. history.

Within a week after President Carter announced his decision to terminate this treaty, I filed suit in the Federal courts with 60 other Members of Congress challenging the constitutionality of his action. That lawsuit was considered at all three levels of the Federal judiciary. The district court upheld my challenge and declared the President's action unconstitutional. However, the court of appeals, by a 4-to-1 vote, supported the President's authority to unilaterally end the treaty.

Then the Supreme Court overturned the court of appeals. The High Court granted certiorari and vacated the decision by the court of appeals. Although the Supreme Court did not reach the basic constitutional issue concerning the allotment of the treaty termination power, it is clear that its final decision left the President without any judicial approval of his claim of unilateral authority.

The plurality opinion by four members of the Supreme Court in Goldwater versus Carter stated that treaty termination must be resolved among the legislative and executive branches themselves, without judicial intervention. The plurality opinion characterized the case as a political question involving a dispute between co-equal branches of our Government, each of which has resources available to protect and assert its interest.

In other words, the Supreme Court has invited a legislative response to the subject. If we are interested in protecting our power under the Constitution, it is up to us personally to assert that interest.

Mr. President, the Republic of China Defense Treaty is now behind us but there are numerous other defense and security treaties, both bilateral and multilateral, which may present the identical issue. The Library of Congress has identified at least 17 international agreements of this kind and I ask unanimous consent that a list of these treaties shall appear in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The flaw in the Supreme Court plurality opinion is that a treaty will, for all practical purposes, be terminated before Congress can do anything about it. If the courts refuse to take jurisdiction, no one can stop the termination of the treaty once any grace period of prior notice called for in the treaty has ended. Congress can deny all funds to operate the State Department. The treaty will still not exist. Once it is terminated, it is wiped off the slate. Congress does not have the ability to keep a treaty alive that is already terminated; nor can the Senate make a new treaty by itself.

The subject should not be left to case-by-case development whenever the next crisis arises. The Senate should act now to express our position on the constitutional law which governs the termination of defense and security treaties.

By adopting a formal resolution, we will likely confer standing on the Senate to contest any future unilateral termination by a President of a military treaty. If a difference arises between the President and the Senate, a prior declaration by the Senate as a coequal treaty making power may persuade a majority of the Supreme Court to change its mind on application of the political question doctrine.

Most likely, however, the adoption of the resolution will encourage the Executive and Senate to work in unison on the subject.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 41—RELATIVE TO THE FUNDS OF THE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. HOLLINGS (for himself, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. SASSER, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. FORD, Mr. BYRD, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. NUNN, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. DIXON, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. GLENN, and Mr. JOHNSTON): submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

S. RES. 41

Whereas unemployment in the United States was still at the intolerable rate of 7.2 percent for December 1984, and that unemployment was above 12 percent in 748 counties of the Nation on that date, and unemployment was 18.8 percent among youth, including 42.1 percent among black youth;

Whereas the Economic Development Administration has proven an effective instrument in assisting communities, particularly rural areas, in their efforts to develop job opportunities;

Whereas the administration's alternatives to the assistance provided by the Economic Development Administration have not been enacted by the Congress so there is nothing in place to assist those areas who are beyond the national economic mainstream; and

Whereas the administration proposes to rescind $179,000,000 of the $200,000,000 appropriated in fiscal year 1985 for the "Economic Development Assistance Programs" administered by the Economic Development Administration, when there are so many communities in desperate need for development assistance and have no alternative source of such assistance: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate hereby urges the President to reconsider the rescission of the funds for "Economic Development Assistance Programs" and to make the full amount available for obligation in fiscal year 1985.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, as we celebrate the inauguration of the President today, we also mark the beginning of the fifth annual battle to save the Economic Development Administration. Shortly after President Reagan's first inauguration, he submitted his revisions to President Carter's budget. Those proposals included a rescission to half the funds already appropriated to EDA for fiscal 1981 and no funding for fiscal year 1982. Every Reagan budget has called for the elimination of EDA.

Congress has reduced EDA to a $200 million a year program, but has rejected all the administration's efforts to terminate this program. The Congress appreciates that EDA is one of the few programs that rural areas, such as Marion, SC, with its 15-percent unemployment, can look to for help in creating the permanent job opportunities they sorely need. The White House says that the national economic growth and their still unenacted, enterprise zones can replace EDA, but they'll be no enterprise zones for Marion and the other American communities outside the economic mainstream.

The Senate will recall that in 1983 the administration proposed deferring the funds appropriated to EDA. They wanted to put the money in the freeze in order to use the money to pay off the SBA guaranteed business loans that went into default during the 1982 recession. We resisted that move by passing Senate Resolution 49, which I introduced with 51 cosponsors.

Mr. President, once again the administration plans to dismantle the Economic Development Administration. While the widely distributed Stockman "freeze plus options" propose EDA for termination in fiscal 1986, the Department of Commerce has jumped the gun and also cut off the funding appropriated for fiscal 1985. On January 8, action was taken to impound $179 million of the $200 million appropriated for EDA's "economic development assistance programs." These programs provide assistance to our communities in the form of public works grants, planning and technical assistance, and economic adjustment grants.

This Senator takes a back seat to no one in the effort to reduce the Federal deficit. I will not repeat our freeze proposal that will reduce the deficit to $29 billion by fiscal 1989, but that is based on a "freeze" and not a "termination" of necessary Federal programs, Mr. Stockman proposes a freeze plus, with plus meaning more for Defense and termination of EDA, SBA, Appalachia, and other domestic programs.

Last year when we enacted the Commerce, Justice and State appropriations bill, Mr. Stockman gave it his blessing and President Reagan signed the bill into law. Before the election the Department of Commerce assured us that all the appropriations had been made available to EDA, NOAA, and so forth, and that nothing was held back. Now that the election is over, we find the budget officer of EDA issuing a document indicating $179 million is no longer available for obligation in order to be "consistent with final departmental and OMB determinations."

Mr. President, there are 748 counties in the United States with more than 12 percent unemployment. Furthermore, unemployment among youth is 18.8 percent, and 42.1 percent among black youth. You don't have to go to Marion to find high unemployment, just go up North Capitol Street a few blocks and ask the young people of Washington how much of the national prosperity has trickled down to them.

As the Senate knows, a rescission does not go into effect unless the Congress affirmatively passes a bill to withdraw the appropriation. In the case of the EDA I really don't expect that to happen, given Congress' past support for the program. However, under the terms of the Budget Act, the funds are impounded for 45 days of continuous session of the Congress.

Therefore it would be early April before the funds would again have to be made available, while EDA and our drowning communities tread water.

Mr. President, we should not lose this time. I am today introducing a resolution by which the Senate can call upon the President to reconsider the proposed rescission and to make the funds available. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

This resolution is submitted on behalf of myself, and Senator BUMPERS, Senator BINGAMAN, Senator SASSER, Senator PRYOR, Senator SARBANES, Senator STENNIS, Senator FORD, Senator BYRD, Senator MITCHELL, Senator ROCKEFELLER, Senator NUNN, Senator LEVIN, Senator RIEGLE, Senator BURDICK, Senator DIXON, Senator EAGLETON, Senator BRADLEY, Senator LEAHY, Senator GLENN, and Senator JOHNSTON.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

MINNESOTA'S REVENGE?

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, out of duty to my home State, I must take a moment to quash a rather distressing rumor that has been circulating around our Nation's Capital on this inauguration day. It is, indeed, disappointing that unusally frigid weather has forced the cancellation of the traditional outdoor inaugural festivities. However, let me state for the RECORD that, despite some speculation, this unfortunate situation cannot be traced to "Minnesota's Revenge."

True, Minnesota brazenly went its own way in the most recent Presidential election. Certainly, this Senator would have chosen a different outcome at his State's polls. But Minnesota has always had a penchant for pulling out of the pack—and then expressing surprise that the rest of the pack is going the wrong way. That is part of what makes us such an endearing lot, or so I am told.

It is also true that, since the November election, Minnesota and Minnesotans have become the target of uncounted political jokes. For instance, at the CIA (in which I have taken a special interest lately), they get a chuckle out of saying, "We're not going to invade Nicaragua this week. Minnesota comes first."

But would Minnesota use any of this as an excuse to take an icy revenge on our Capital on inauguration day? Are we witnessing the opening salvo of a new cold war? Certainly not. Minnesotans are not bitter people. We have a terrific sense of humor. You have to have a good sense of humor when the temperature is pushing 90 degrees below zero. Laughing creates warmth. It is a survival instinct.

Besides, if Minnesota were to exact revenge by weather, it could do much better than this. As any Minnesotan knows, this is not really cold. Cold is when the snow squeaks underfoot. Cold is when your eyelids freeze together before you even get to the driveway. Cold is when you walk to your car from the dry cleaners and your shirts shatter. But this is more like a nice spring day in International Falls. Minnesotans have picnics in weather colder than this.

Mr. President, I do not intend to belabor this point. But allow me to remind my distinguished colleagues that last month, President Reagan was asked by the press what gift he would like for Christmas and he answered, "Minnesota." Today he got his wish.●

PAUL TSONGAS—HEADING HOME

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, during the recent adjournment, I read "Heading Home," a new book written by our now former colleague, Paul Tsongas.

The book is full of insights each of us will be benefited by. Paul was confronted by a difficult choice—an almost certain second 6-year term with ongoing separations from his growing family—or heading home to that family and being with them as they grow.

His illness did not dictate his choice—his self-awareness and his priorities did.

As we all so vividly remember, he chose to head home.

As much as I shall miss him—as much as we shall all miss him and his constant integrity—I congratulate him on his choice.

His compelling story makes it more likely that his readers will make right choices—for family and for community and for home when options are open to them.●

REPRESENTATIVE GILLIS LONG

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I join my colleagues on both sides of the aisle and in the other chamber in great sadness and regret at the death of Congressman GILLIS LONG.

I feel a great personal loss at Congressman LONG's untimely passing. As chairman and vice chairman-designate, respectively, of the Joint Economic Committee, he and I had established a close and productive working relationship. In our work together to organize the committee for the 99th Congress, I developed the greatest respect and admiration for GILLIS' abilities and dedication.

GILLIS LONG will be missed by more than the Eighth Congessional District of Louisiana, the people he represented in Congress for seven terms. He would have, I believe, been a truly fine chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, using the prestigious panel as a voice for the Americans who are overlooked and, in fact, often completely forgotten by those who determine our Nation's economic policies.

In fact, he and I had many discussions about using the Joint Economic Committee to assist the people of rural America, those who have not shared in our Nation's economic recovery. GILLIS and I represented different types of agricultural areas. His people grow cotton, rice, and sugar. We shared the belief, however, that all citizens should share in our country's prosperity, and we had dedicated ourselves to a partnership aimed at developing the innovative ideas and programs necessary to put rural America back on its feet.

GILLIS and I were both elected to the House in 1972, although he served for one term in 1963. I know that the people of central Louisiana will dearly miss his leadership abilities and the helping hand he offered them.

I offer my sincerest condolences to his wife, Mary Catherine, and their two children. I will miss him, both as a colleague and a friend.●

KEN WATSON

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, Ken Watson, a distinguished Illinois political reporter, and my good friend, died on December 30, 1984, in Springfield, IL.

Kenny was a truly fine human being who endeared himself to thousands with his integrity, loyalty, and good humor. We shall miss him very much.

Edward H. Armstrong, editor of the State Journal-Register and Ken Watson's colleague for 30 years, wrote the following tribute to our friend and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

A TRUE GENTLEMAN OF THE PRESS

(By Ed Armstrong)

Ken Watson was a gentleman in the truest sense of the word. So it was with a feeling of shock and sadness that friends and co-workers learned of his death in the midst of the holiday season.

I was not one of Ken's close friends who shared the daily lunch table with him at Norb Andy's, but as one who worked with him for more than 30 years, I appreciated his skill as a journalist and admired him even more as a person.

Ken appeared to be rather shy, yet he genuinely liked people. And he lived the Golden Rule, treating others the way he wanted to be treated. If he wrote critically or pessimistically, it was out of a sense of duty to be objective, not out of any vindictiveness or any desire to see bad things happen.

Ken had more tragedy in his life than most of us experience, but he seldom complained.

He was nearing 40 when he and Anne Lavin were married. They seemed to be a truly happily married couple, sharing love and respect. But within a few years Anne was stricken with cancer and she died just 10 years after they were wed.

It was perhaps three years later that on a bitter winter morning Ken came to work in obvious ill health. The late Dan Cronin insisted that Ken go to the hospital, and, over his protestations, took him there. Within hours Ken underwent surgery for replacement of a heart valve.

Eventually, he had to have that surgery repeated. Then on New Year's day of 1984 he slipped on ice in the parking lot near his apartment and suffered a broken leg.

Amidst all these personal difficulties he retained his sense of humor and was generally an optimist. He was looking forward to probable early retirement for travel and fun when fate took him all too soon.

In addition to family and friends, two things seemed most important to Ken: politics and sports. Writing about politics was his vocation; talking about it was an avocation.

His other principal avocation was rooting on Riverton High School basketball teams, University of Illinois football and basketball teams and the St. Louis baseball Cardinals.

He was such a U of I partisan that friends jokingly spread the story that he suffered his New Year's Day broken leg last year kicking his TV set because the Illini fared so poorly in the Rose Bowl.

Ken's love of sports surfaced in the similes that often appeared in his columns, comparing situations in politics and government with the fortunes or misfortunes of college and professional sports figures or teams.

His vacations frequently coincided with Cardinals vs. Cubs series in St. Louis and Chicago.

Ken was not cut out for the mechanical age into which he was born. His close friends tell stories about his problems behind the wheel of his car. I saw first hand his encounters with present day electronics.

Using the manual typewriters he grew up with, his fingers flew over the keys in fits and spurts, as he cranked out copy in a hurry on a breaking story. When we switched to electric typewriters, he typed with the same fits and spurts as the words came to mind. He was the only person I ever knew who could type an uneven line or put one letter on top of another with an electric typewriter.

We knew that using computer terminals instead of typewriters would be a challenge for Ken, and it was—so much so that he never wrote his column on the terminal but wrote it on a typewriter then retyped it into the terminal.

But it was also Ken's assignment from time to time to edit copy for the editorial page, and that had to be done on the terminal. He met the challenge, just as he met so many other challenges in life.

All of us have our foibles. Ken had his share, but he also had a knack of laughing at himself, and the rest of us laughed with him, not at him. He had much pride but little vanity.

I'm sure many readers miss his analyses and evaluations from "under the statehouse dome," but even more than his work, we who knew him well will miss Ken Watson the person—a warm, friendly, caring, intensely loyal human being.●

LT. GOV. GEORGE RYAN OF ILLINOIS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, Lt. Gov. George Ryan of Illinois made a talk to the International Business Council of Mid America pointing out the need for foreign language study as a key to business growth.

That is becoming more widely recognized in the House and in the Senate.

Last year, I am pleased to say, with an overwhelming bipartisan vote, the House of Representatives passed a bill of mine to encourage foreign language study in the schools of the Nation. There has been substantial indication of support for efforts in that direction among Senators also. And members of the administration have expressed concern about our language deficiencies, including Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger and CIA Director William Casey.

Lieutenant Governor Ryan makes a great deal of sense in his speech and I urge my colleagues in the House and Senate to read his remarks which I ask to be inserted in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS DELIVERED TO INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS COUNCIL MID AMERICA—HUB III, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1984, CHICAGO, IL.—LT. GOV. GEORGE RYAN

Good afternoon. It is a pleasure to join the International Business Council Mid America in HUB Three—bringing a special focus to high schools, universities, and businesses in a Third Annual Conference. The theme for the Conference, as you know, is "Bringing Together the Worlds of Education and International Business," and I feel privileged to have this opportunity to offer my views on one aspect of that goal. I come before you today to address "the need for mobilizing resources within the State to create jobs in international trade."

I consider this an important subject, because like many business observers, I'm convinced that our future economic prosperity in Illinois will depend on our ability to export our products and services abroad. During these 1st two years of my term as Lieutenant Governor, I've spent a great deal of time talking about the need for us to expand our export capabilities in Illinois—especially among our small and medium sized businesses. I want to share my views on that with you today, and then expand my topic a bit to reflect the theme of this Conference. That is, examine how we must use our educational resources to enhance our international perspective and help create an export-oriented economy.

Illinois, perhaps more than many other states, has long recognized the importance of exports to our economy. Whether it's marketing Illinois coal, selling our agricultural products, or promoting foreign investment and tourism, our economic prosperity in Illinois is inexorably linked to international trade. There is already a significant "international presence" in Chicago as more than 50 international banks have branches or representative offices and more than 60 nations maintain consulates here. In agricultural products, Illinois ranks number one in exports. In manufactured goods, we rank third among the states in exports. Overall, our state rings up more than 19 billion dollars annually in export sales.

What this means, of course, is jobs—more than 500,000 jobs for Illinoisans. The U.S. Department of Commerce estimates that every $1 billion in exports translates into about 25,000 jobs in the economy. The Department also estimates that almost 80% of all new jobs created in the United States are export related.

In Illinois, we believe the greatest potential for creating these new jobs through exports and promoting economic development is with small and medium sized businesses. Currently, this sector is believed to account for no more than 10% of total exports. And it's an under-tapped resource nationwide as well. At least 20,000 small and medium size businesses in this country have the potential to competitively and profitably market their products overseas, but do not.

We're working to change that in Illinois. Recognizing that the lack of financing is the single greatest impediment to exporting by small firms, the State Legislature last year passed significant new legislation. This new law created the Illinois Export Development Authority to help provide financing. The General Assembly asked me as Lieutenant Governor to chair the Authority, and Governor Thompson has now appointed the other members. At its first meeting, held last month, the Authority agreed to aim to be fully operational by mid-1985, providing a new source of capital to be used exclusively for the financing of pre-shipment and post-shipment of exports by small and medium sized firms. This new capital source will be made available to Illinois financial institutions to be used in their local communities. We're moving quickly to develop operational guidelines so that we can fully tap the export potential of Illinois' small businesses.

A companion bill to this legislation created an Illinois Export Council, which I also chair. We have already begun to examine ways that existing state resources can be redirected to promote an exporting awareness among Illinois' 250,000 small businesses. One of the Councils overall goals is to ensure that small business development and export promotion are mutually supportive strategies for our economic development in Illinois.

One way to do that is to go to the experts: the small business owners and operators themselves. In May of this year, we did just that when I had the privilege of convening the Illinois Conference on Small Business. This 2-day meeting drew over 400 delegates from throughout the State to discuss a variety of issues affecting small business. Through its discussions, the Conference stressed the importance of small business expansion in the international marketplace. Delegates pointed out that the efficiency of small business is really our best weapon against foreign competition and our best bet for maintaining continued economic growth and expansion. Consider that global competition today places at least three demands on companies; that they be highly innovative; readily adaptable to changing markets; and have workers who are flexible enough to learn new tasks quickly. Small businesses meet those criteria easily. Because of that, the Conference attendees agreed that in many ways small and medium sized companies offer America's best hope of regaining competitiveness in the world market.

The 1984 Conference on Small Business also recognized that government must play the leading role in providing a well-educated work force—a crucial ingredient for businesses to compete in international markets. Specifically, the Conference formally recommended that government improve the availability of information on international trade requirements, techniques, and opportunities by encouraging foreign language and cross-culture training at all levels of education. Delegates pointed out that many small business people lack the market and cultural sophistication in dealing with foreign buyers. The customs and marketing strategies used successfully in domestic sales may simply not work when dealing with buyers from Asia or Europe. This lack of expertise and the mysticism that sometimes surrounds international transactions is often an effective barrier for small business people seeking to enter the international marketplace. The small business conference delegates recognize that without foreign language training, Americans engaged in business abroad are at a distinct disadvantage. After all, "the language of business is the language of your client." Experience and statistics clearly demonstrate that the single effective method of developing overseas sales is through personal contact. In short, these delegates reflected a growing awareness within the business community that increasingly competitive world markets demand sensitivity to, and communicative competence in, the language and cultural background of foreign customers.

This touches on the theme of this Conference and is what I'd like to discuss now in greater detail. That is, how can we use our educational resources to enhance international trade, and what should we do to act?

In doing some of the research on this subject of education and language proficiency and the relationship to international trade, I've discovered a wealth of information available. There have been a multitude of reports and studies already completed. Among them:

1. The 1979 Report of a Statewide Task Force on Foreign Language and International Studies—a group appointed by the Illinois Superintendent of Education. Their report, known as the "Illinois Plan" recommended a 5-year phased-in program for local districts to improve foreign language instruction in Illinois schools but contained no mandates for implementation.

2. The Report of the President's Commission on Foreign Language and International Studies (1979). The Commission, in examining the problem, said "Americans' incompetence in foreign languages is nothing short of scandalous and it is becoming worse."

3. The Report of the National Commission on Excellence in Education, submitted to the U.S. Secretary of Education (1983). This document recommended that language learning for all children begin in elementary school.

4. The July, 1984 Preliminary Report of the Illinois Commission on the Improvement of Elementary and Secondary Education—a bipartisan legislative body, and

5. The May, 1984 Report of the Citizens Panel on Foreign Language and International Studies—another group appointed by the Illinois Superintendent of Education. This excellent report, submitted to the State Board, was entitled "Education for the Times . . . In Time—A Report on the Need to Develop the Language Proficiencies and International Perspectives of Illinois Citizens."

Each of these documents reviewed many different problems of our educational system but all cited in some way our deficiencies in foreign languages and international studies.

I must admit that as a parent and public official, I was previously unaware of the real importance of foreign language learning for students. During the course of my research, in reviewing all of these studies, I discovered facts that I consider nothing short of learning—facts such as these:

A 1980 State-by-State survey of high school diploma requirements found that only 8 states require high schools to offer foreign language instruction, but none required students to take the courses.

Only approximately 25% of Illinois high school students have studied a 2nd language. And, even though it is generally accepted that four to six years of study are needed for minimal proficiency, only approximately 3% continue language learning beyond the 2nd year of study.

Only approximately 1% of high school students study the less common languages—such as Japanese, Chinese, Russian, and Arabic—yet these are of critical importance in the world today, being spoken by more than 80% of the world's population.

Only 8% of American colleges and universities now require a foreign language for admission, compared with 34% in 1966.

The U.S. appears alone among developed nations in its attitude towards foreign language learning. Consider, for example, that

In Germany, 2 foreign languages are learned by students beginning in the 5th and 6th grades.

In France, foreign language learning begins in the 6th grade in one language and a second begins in the ninth grade.

In Japan, an estimated 80% of all students take foreign languages beginning in sixth grade.

In Russia, nearly all students study at least one foreign language in high school.

The 1970 President's Commission reported that our weakness in foreign language learning "pose a threat to America's security and economic viability."

This last point, economic viability, is the focus of my remarks today. As Lieutenant Governor and Chairman of the Illinois Export Council and Export Development Authority, I'm concerned about our ability to function in the world marketplace. Our exports mean jobs for our people. There's no question that much of our future economic growth in Illinois will come from international trade. Our business must compete in a world economy. But our lack of foreign language competence will undoubtedly diminish our ability to compete effectively.

As in so many areas, we can point to the Japanese as a prime example. I don't believe the Japanese are technologically superior to us, nor are their workers any better. But, there are an estimated 10,000 English-speaking Japanese in this country representing Japan's businesses. In contrast, only a few hundred American business representatives are in Japan and only a handful are proficient in Japanese. The lesson to be learned here is clear—our economic viability does rest on language proficiency. A former U.S. Assistant Secretary of Commerce has stated and I quote: "Our linguistic parochialism has had a negative effect on our trade balance. In fact, it is one of the most subtle nontariff barriers to our export expansion."

But even beyond clear business considerations, we must also recognize that foreign language learning and international studies are important in understanding other cultures. The world is growing smaller and our children must be prepared to interact with other peoples. My friend (and former Lieutenant Governor) Paul Simon very eloquently stated this when he wrote and I quote: "Language is a key to opening minds and attitudes. To speak, read, write, and understand another language is the beginning of understanding other people. If we do not understand others' dreams, hopes, and miseries—if we live in a narrow, closeted world—we will fail to elect and select leaders who can take us down the difficult pathway to peace. Leadership cannot be too far ahead of those who follow or it is no longer leadership. A self-centered uninformed public is unlikely to choose those who will make the hard decisions necessary for building a solid foundation for world peace and justice." End Quote.

Congressman Simon attempted to address the need for foreign language competence by introducing the Foreign Language Assistance for National Security Act of 1983. This bill passed the House but unfortunately died in the Senate. It would have provided grants to promote the growth of, and improve the quality of, foreign language instruction at the elementary, secondary, and post-secondary levels. The bill would have been a good first step, and I hope Paul Simon reintroduces it in the U.S. Senate next year.

We must realize, of course, that language competence cannot be established overnight. But it is necessary that we as a society recognize the importance of developing the foreign language competence and international sensitivities of our students. In my opinion, foreign languages and international studies should be considered an integral part of the curriculum in our schools. They should be viewed as every bit as basic and fundamental as English, Math, Science, and Social Studies (and as important as the newly-recommended training in computer science). In its report entitled "A Nation at Risk" the National Commission on Excellence in Education agreed that curriculum standards must be strengthened and said and I quote:

"Achieving proficiency in a foreign language ordinarily requires from 4 to 6 years of study and should, therefore, be started in the elementary grades. We believe it is desirable that students achieve such proficiency because study of a foreign language introduces students to non-English speaking cultures, heightens awareness and comprehension of one's native tongue, and serves the Nation's needs in commerce, diplomacy, defense, and education." End Quote.

In short, while I agree with the view that our school should "return to the basics," I believe we must include this issue of language competence in the overall discussion of education reform—in Illinois and throughout the nation.

Certainly, basic skills are important. We have young people graduating from our schools without having obtained the necessary knowledge to successfully compete in a rapidly changing society. The people of this State have long demanded an excellent educational system. But the quality of our educational system is determined, finally, by what our children learn—and then what they can do with that knowledge.

Historically, the State has promoted local control of schools and has confined its role to suggesting means of improvement. State mandates and regulations may conflict with local priorities and in many cases are not adequately funded.

Traditionally, I have opposed many State mandates on local schools. But this is the time when educational reform is being thoroughly discussed. All of us—local officials, legislators, educators, business people, and parents—must examine the organization and funding of our schools. We must evaluate the curriculum and review standards. We must fundamentally redefine our commitment to education—what we want to achieve and how we want to achieve it. It is within the context of this debate that I believe we must examine the importance of foreign language competence.

In my view, a persuasive case has been made for the compelling need to develop, through our educational system in this State, the language competence and international sensitivities of our citizens. Foreign language proficiency clearly plays a fundamental role in technology transfer for economic development. Language learning has a clear, positive effect on the acquisition of verbal and other cognitive skills. And in Illinois, one of the nation's leading exporting states, our future economic strength—in trade, industry, finance, agriculture, and tourism—rests on our foreign language competence and our understanding of other cultures. World markets are increasingly competitive, and as I mentioned, business leaders are increasingly recognizing the fact that the language of international business is the language spoken by present and potential customers.

What, then, should be done?

On the national level, President Reagan declared: "I urge parents and community and business leaders alike to join educators in encouraging our youth to begin the study of foreign language at an early age and to continue the study of this language until a significant level of proficiency has been achieved." Both Houses of Congress have adopted a resolution recommending "the strengthening of the study of foreign languages and cultures," and I previously mentioned Congressman Simon's legislation.

The National Commission on Excellence in Education recommended sweeping educational reforms, but stated that states and localities have "the primary responsibility for financing and governing the schools. . . ." Yet at the same time the Commission said that the Federal Government should identify and help fund "the national interest in education." With all the reforms, the question is, who pays? I believe we should expect that no concrete corrective measures will be undertaken immediately at the Federal level to address the need for language competence.

So what should we do at the State level? I believe we should act immediately to implement the recommendations of the report submitted by the State Board Citizens Panel in May of this year. Specifically, we should recognize Foreign Languages and International Studies as a "fundamental area of learning." We should begin now to phase in a comprehensive program to improve and expand the teaching of languages and international studies—beginning in the elementary grades and continuing at least through our secondary schools.

We in Illinois have already identified the problem and taken some steps to address it. The "Illinois Plan" approved in 1979 has already provided 5 years of experience, data collection, and technical assistance. In early 1984, the Chicago Board of Education adopted a 2-year language requirement for high school graduation—a mandate applying to over 116,000 high school students in the city. These are good first steps, but we must make the firm commitment to provide foreign language instruction to all our students in Illinois.

We must act now. As recommended by the Citizens Panel, we should develop the necessary staff improvements, curriculum changes, public support, and implementation strategies to help assure the language competence and international sensitivities of our children. Local school districts are simply not presently responding adequately to this need. Therefore, the State should now launch a bold initiative to commit the resources necessary to support implementation of a comprehensive program. We need decisive leadership from the State Board, the Governor, and the General Assembly—and we need to generate the support of the public by assuring they understand the importance of langage and international studies. I believe the public will understand—a University of Michigan survey reported that 75% of Americans believe that language learning should begin in elementary schools.

The National Commission on Excellence in Education and the Illinois State Board of Education have both urged that language learning for all children begin in elementary school—and should continue for 4-6 years. To assure our future economic viability, we should make this recommendation a requirement. The time has come to move beyond recommendations and act to implement them.

The 1985 Session of the Legislature will surely deal with the subject of educational reform. Problems must be dealt with and solutions must be found. Some solutions may be costly. But there can be no quick fix. The National Commission on Excellence in Education warned of a "rising tide of mediocrity" in our schools. The President has called for implementing the proposed reforms at a cost of $14 billion to states and local communities. Clearly, a solution of this magnitude will require a joint, concerted effort by state and local governments and the federal government.

But we have no alternative. Our nation's strength will be based on the knowledge acquired by our children. If we allow our schools to graduate "mediocre" students, our economic competitiveness will surely suffer.

The current climate for educational reform provides us the opportunity to make the necessary changes so that our children are prepared for the future. Languages and international studies are linked to excellence in education—we must understand they are as fundamental to a sound education as reading, writing, and arithmetic.

The Citizens Panel dedicated its report to the class of 2001—pointing out that children born this year (including my grandson) will likely graduate from high school in that year. Our education system must prepare them for living and working in an ever-shrinking world. As evidenced by events of the past decade—with oil and grain embargoes, increasing 3rd world debt, and advancing technology—the world's economy is totally interdependent. Americans must have a clear understanding of world issues—and to gain that understanding we must increase our language competence and our sensitivities to other cultures. We must begin now to improve our educational system, so that our children (and our grandchildren) will be prepared for the world of the 21st century.●

THE 67TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE IN UKRAINE

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today marks the 67th anniversary of the January 1918 proclamation of independence in Ukraine. This proclamation in Kiev was the culmination of the Ukrainian national movement, which followed the fall of the Russian czar, and the triumph over 200 years of imperialistic Russian rule. The Ukrainian Republic, however, was forced to wage a defensive war against the Red and White Russians in the east, and against the Poles in the west. By 1920, the Communists shattered the Ukrainian defense, and succeeded in occupying Ukraine.

Each July Fourth, citizens of the United States celebrate the birth of their independence. January 22 should be a similarly great day for all Ukrainians. Unfortunately, it is not. The 50 million people in Ukraine are forbidden to celebrate this date by the oppressive Russian Government. Moreover, any nationalistic movement from Ukraine, on this, or any other day, is instantly squelched, and "perpetrators" are imprisoned for "anti-Soviet behavior" pursuant to the Soviet criminal code.

For over 3 million Ukrainians and their descendents living outside Ukraine, the freedom and independence of Ukraine are of paramount importance. Observances held to commemorate Ukrainian independence are a constant reminder to the world that Ukraine was independent, at one time, and that the international community must recognize this historic fact and accept it in accordance with the right of self-determination for all peoples.

My empathy for the Ukrainians in their struggle against the dictatorial Soviet regime led me to introduce a resolution in the last Congress that proclaimed a day for mournful commemoration of the great famine in Ukraine during the year 1933, deliberately inflicted upon them by the imperialistic policy of Moscow. Moscow's purpose was to destroy the intellectual elite and large segments of the population of Ukraine and thus enhance its totalitarian Communist rule over the conquered Ukrainian Nation. This resolution, which passed the House and Senate, also issued a warning to the Soviet Union that continued subjugation of the Ukrainian Nation, as well as other non-Russian nations within the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, constitutes a threat to world peace and normal relations among the peoples of Europe and the world at large.

Let us not forget these times in Ukrainian history, for they show the courage of a people determined not to acquiesce to the ruthlessness of a tyrannical regime. Let us recognize January 22 as a date of historical significance, not only to Ukrainians, but to all people, throughout the world, who espouse the principles of democracy and freedom.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

THE WRITING OF JEFFREY SCHEUER

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the recent Presidential election gave good cause for many to comment on the choice before the electorate and what the choice would mean. It was not to be—or so we were told—a choice just between two men. Rather between two visions. It was also to be something of a referendum on liberalism, although few gave the word any more definition than some references to Franklin Delano Roosevelt and the New Deal.

Jeffrey Scheuer's writing proved an exception. He brought true definition to liberalism and the ramifications of subscribing to a liberal or conservative view. We would all do well to read what he wrote.

Mr. President, I ask that two of Jeffrey Scheuer's op-eds be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The articles follow:

ALTERNATIVE VISIONS OF FREEDOM

(By Jeffrey Scheuer)

This year's presidential campaign offers a dramatic choice. The President got it right when he said, in accepting his party's nomination, that it's a choice "between two different visions of the future, two fundamentally different ways of governing."

On the surface, it is a difference of perspective on all of the particular issues that inform our political dialogue—from tax policy to gun control. But in fact such issues are merely kindling in the hardwood fires of ideological debate. They are fueled by underlying differences of philosophy: different views of equality and justice on one level; but, ultimately, different conceptions of human freedom.

The reason for this is not obscure. We all value freedom, not by accident, but because it is a special value, unlike any other: the very gateway to our other values. We can pursue no end without the freedom to do so. More than what we choose, we value choice itself. Nevertheless, in moral and political terms, we understand freedom in different and competing ways.

In the view of President Reagan and his supporters, freedom is an essentially simple value, and the primary impediment to freedom is government. On that principal, conservatives advocate economic laissez-faire and Social Darwinism; any governmental interference in the marketplace abridges freedom. Clearly, the conservative argument has simplicity on its side.

In the liberal view, however—the view implicit in Walter Mondale's appeal for our vote—freedom is a very complex value. From this perspective, the state is just one potential impediment to individual liberty, and its moral function is to neutralize another, more basic kind of impediment. This latter impediment is the freedom of other individuals and institutions—from pickpockets to industrial polluters.

The liberal thus follows Lincoln's dictum, that freedom for the wolf is not the same as freedom for the sheep. The best government is not that which governs least or most but that which governs judiciously, as a liberating force; or as Mondale put it, a government that is "off our backs, but on our side."

These different conceptions of freedom have vastly different implications, especially in terns of economic equality: the hard material terms of who gets what in our society, the distribution of goods and opportunities. For the conservative, formal equality of opportunity is sufficient, and anything more abridges freedom. But for the liberal, equality of opportunity is not enough because, in reality, opportunities and rewards are interdependent. Such equality does not abridge freedom per se, but merely protects ovine rights against lupine license.

Consequently, conservatives equate economic freedom with capitalism, tout court; but for liberals, the "free" market is freedom for the wolf: an engine of efficiency perhaps, but not of justice. Thus liberal freedom means neither unvarnished capitalism nor socialism, but a combination of public and private enterprise and ownership. [This is not such a radical idea; taking a public bus to work is a socialist act.]

These alternative visions are essential to the statement that American voters will make this fall. It is a choice between a more or a less complex view of human freedom, and the correlative rights to which we are entitled. In fact, different thresholds of complexity go far to explain differences of political ideology—not just this year but whenever we are called upon to make political judgments.

Perhaps, as some philosophers suggest, freedom is an "essentially contested concept," and these different viewpoints cannot in the end be reconciled. But, more important, neither can they be dismissed as simply wrong or out of step with the times. Although we are hardly a nation of philosophers, all of our politics, however disguised or corrupted by imagery and rhetoric, consists of such ideological discourse about moral and philosophical questions.

When we acknowledge this, instead of foolishly dismissing "ideology" as something obscure or irrelevant—when we realize that basic moral values are always at issues, and freedom most of all—our political dialogue will be that of a great and mature democracy.

[From the Chicago Tribune, June 22, 1984]

WHY LIBERAL IDEAS WON'T DIE

(By Jeffrey Scheuer)

It's been four years since Sen. Edward Kennedy delivered a ringing oratorical call to liberal ideals at the Democratic convention in New York, declaring that "the dream shall never die." He brought down the house at Madison Square Garden, but as the chief spokesman that year for liberal Democrats, he was a minority voice.

Now, four years later, as the Democrats prepare to fight another internecine struggle, this time in San Francisco, it seems it's still more fashionable to talk about "new ideas" and "rainbow coalitions" and say that liberalism is dead—even though it appears the nominee will be Walter Mondale, an archetypal liberal shaped in the mold of Hubert Humphrey.

But if we set aside the petty political squabbles of the primary season, and take a longer, more philosophical view of this apparent contradiction, it might well be concluded that eulogies for liberalism are premature. Its ailments, though perhaps chronic, are never terminal.

The term "liberal" is of course somewhat ambiguous, as are "conservative" and "radical." But liberalism can be defined, first of all, as that part of the political spectrum that holds individual freedom to be paramount among moral and political values. Second, it is animated by the notion that people have certain basic rights, or inviolate freedoms—not by virtue of birth or status, or because having them contributes to some greater good, but simply because we are individuals. Ultimately, there is no higher good than our freedom itself.

Freedom is the primary value precisely because it is the gateway to all other values; it is the currency, so to speak, of our moral economy. My private ends, whatever they may be, are contingent upon my freedom to pursue them. Thus, to assert the primacy of freedom is not to choose among values but rather to acknowledge the supreme value of choice itself.

Liberals, furthermore, see a natural link between freedom and equality. The state is not the only impediment to freedom; indeed, its very raison d'etre is to equalize freedom, thus neutralizing other impediments—from pickpockets to industrial polluters.

The liberal's question, then, is not whether the state ought to regulate society, but how; not whether government should be big or small, but where and how far it can be a liberating force. To do this, the state must be variously absent, present and dominant in different sectors of human society; much more than a "nightwatchman" and much less than a "Big Brother."

Although liberalism undoubtedly will revive in America, it faces one basic and inherent obstacle, which I would call the "complexity factor." This factor at once suggests a final defining characteristic of liberalism, a cause of its present malaise and the reason it is not about to expire or become obsolete. In fact, the "complexity factor" will be at the very heart of the political debate this November.

Conservatives, with their narrow assumption that big government is bad government, tend to paint a tidy, uncomplicated picture of the power relations in society, thereby minimizing the extent and intricacy of our moral obligations. In their view, capitalism is the essence of freedom, and socialism its antithesis; talent always triumphs over brute circumstance; business enterprise is uniformly a force for the public good; the rights of criminals compete with the rights of victims; military might equates with military security; and foreign states are always unimpeachable friends or blood enemies.

Such a view appeals to order and tradition, privilege and self-interest. But most of all, it appeals to our thirst for simplicity. Conservatism, as such, is an intellectual and emotional bargain.

Liberals, however, reject the notion that the world is so simple and clean. They recognize the enormous complexity of power relations in society and attempt to devise a subtler, more intricate network of reciprocal rights and duties, freedoms and restraints.

If the "complexity factor" in this era of simplicity limits the appeal of liberal ideas, it will never wholly defeat them. Eventually, the electorate will recognize that freedom for the wolf is not the same as freedom for the sheep; that self-interest must adapt to public interest if our social contract is to survive change.

For the Democrats this year, philosophical discourse may not be the road to the White House; but a more complex and sophisticated perspective on public policy issues will be needed by whoever expects to assume the presidency. The complexities of human freedom will not go away. It is tempting to ignore them; understanding them is a far more difficult, more interesting and more humane task—a task that only a truly free and liberal mind dares to undertake.

(Jeffrey Scheuer, a New York writer, has just completed a philosophical study of freedom and equality entitled "The Freedom Nexus.")●

MILESTONE FOR MICHIGAN'S MARONITES

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President. I wish to take this opportunity to recognize February 3, 1985, as the day of dedication of a new Maronite Church, St. Jude Mission, to be located in Harrison Township, MI.

St. Maron's Church and its community have a history in the State of Michigan which dates back to the early 1900's. Maronites immigrating from Lebanon have found friendship and hospitality from its clergy and members. St. Maron's has been a haven for the celebration of faith. The parish has baptized its newborn and buried its dead. It has been a source of joy and consolation.

I know that the new mission will be an extension and continuation of the wonderful customs already established. It will be another gathering point to share a rich culture and heritage and continue a tradition which has enriched the entire community.

I am happy and proud to have the opportunity to recognize this milestone of the Maronite community and to wish its people every success.●

COSPONSORING THE LINE-ITEM VETO, SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 11

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor and to lend my firm support to Senate Joint Resolution 11, legislation introduced by my distinguished colleague from Georgia, Senator MATTINGLY, to give the President line-item veto authority through a constitutional amendment.

Today, the U.S. economy is healthy and growing without significant inflation. However, continued economic progress is threatened by overly large Federal budget deficits. More to the point, increased Government consumption robs industry of the capital needed to put ideas and people back to work. There is little difference between financing increased Government spending through the issuance of new debt or by the imposition of higher taxes. Both methods are equally damaging to the continued vibrance of the economy. Deficit financing and increased taxes both redirect private funds to the Federal Government. The result of either action is that the pool of investment capital is deleted and industrial expansion is stifled.

The root cause of mammoth Federal budget deficits is runaway Government spending. Since fiscal year 1965, Federal spending has increased at an annual average rate of 11.2 percent. Since that time, the deficit has grown from $1.2 to $172 billion. Continued efforts to reduce the deficit through higher taxes have failed.

The Federal budget is a disaster in need of drastic action. Giving the President line-item veto authority would be an important first step toward getting control of Government spending. This would allow the President to reject specific appropriations without vetoing an entire piece of legislation as he must now do. The line-item veto is a budgetary reform that is the simplest way to cut the pork out of the budget.

Currently, Congress adds pork barrel programs to important legislation with virtual impunity. The President often hesitates to veto an entire bill which includes wasteful programs for fear of destroying vital underlying legislation. The line-item veto, therefore, would allow the Chief Executive to eliminate waste without destroying critical policy initiatives.

At this time, 43 Governors have line-item veto authority over State budgets. Many of these States are required by statute to annually balance their books. I can think of no greater tool we can give the President to control wasteful Government spending than the line-item veto. It has been proven effective at the State and local level and now should be implemented by the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to lend their support to Senate Joint Resolution 11.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

A TRIBUTE TO ALBERTA HUNTER

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 21, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to celebrate the life of the great Alberta Hunter, who departed this life on October 17, 1984, at the age of 89 years.

The following obituary, by John S. Wilson, jazz critic of the New York Times, is reprinted as it cites the many accomplishments of this unique artist who is certainly deserving of tribute:

[From the New York Times, Oct. 19, 1984]

ALBERTA HUNTER, 89, CABARET STAR, DIES

(By John S. Wilson)

Alberta Hunter, an internationally famous blues singer and cabaret star in the 1920's and 30's who, after two decades of retirement, began a second successful singing career in her 80's, died Wednesday at her home on Roosevelt Island. She was 89 years old and performed until last summer.

Miss Hunter, a small, frail-looking woman, had a robust singing voice, and she emphasized the best of her songs by slapping her thighs, clapping her hands and snapping her long fingers, setting up a rhythmic momentum in which her audiences soon joined with shouts of encouragement and clapping.

SHE STARTED AT 11

She sang blues, pop songs, show tunes (she played Queenie in the London production of "Show Boat" in 1928), gospel songs and folk songs; she did material in French, Italian, German, Yiddish and Danish. She started singing for $5 a week in a Chicago honky-tonk, became the toast of royalty and international society in Europe and, after deliberately seeking anonymity as a nurse for 20 years, achieved an autumnal triumph in her 80's singing at the Cookery, in Manhattan, to packed houses night after night.

Miss Hunter was born on April 1, 1895, to a chamber maid in a Memphis brothel. Her father, Charles Hunter, was a Pullman porter who died before she knew him. As a child, she was known as Pig ("I was quite messy at that age," she explained). But her childhood was brief, because at the age of 11, encouraged by a report from a friend in Chicago that singers were being paid $10 a week, she got a ride to Chicago with one of her teachers.

During the next eight years, she worked her way up through Hugh Hoskins's club ("Where the pickpocket women did everything in their power to show me how to live a clean life"); the Panama Cafe, where her fellow singers included Florence Mills and Bricktop, and the Dreamland Cafe, where she sang with King Oilver's Creole Jazz Band, which included Louis Armstrong.

Miss Hunter began recording in 1921 with Fletcher Henderson, the pianist and band leader, as her accompanist, a role that was taken on later recordings by Fats Waller, Eubie Blake, Sidney Bechet and Louis Armstrong. At the same time she began writing songs. One of them, "Down-Hearted Blues," was Bessie Smith's first recording, made in 1923.

"It sold a million copies within months," Miss Hunter recalled 55 years later, "and I'm still collecting the royalties. I'm too slick to let them cheat me out of that!"

ON TO NEW YORK AND EUROPE

Miss Hunter moved to New York in 1923 where, within days of her arrival, she replaced Bessie Smith in an all-black musical, "How Come," at the Apollo Theater on 42d Street. After several years of shuttling between New York and Chicago, Miss Hunter went to Eueope and lived for two years in London, where she played in "Show Boat" with a cast that included Paul Robeson, Sir Cedric Hardwick and Mabel Mercer, who was in the chorus.

Miss Hunter came back to the United States later in the 30's, and appeared in 1939 in the play "Mamba's Daughters," with Ethel Waters. In World War II and the Korean War, she entertained troops overseas.

When Miss Hunter's mother, to whom she had remained close all her life, died in 1954, she decided to give up singing and do something "to help humanity." She enrolled in a practical-nursing course at the Harlem Y.W.C.A. and, after graduating, became a scrub nurse at Goldwater Memorial Hospital on Roosevelt Island.

Miss Hunter worked as a scrub nurse for 20 years, never missing a day, never revealing anything about her past. In 1977, the hospital, under the impression that she had reached the mandatory retirement age of 70, made her retire. She was actually 82.

AN IMMEDIATE SENSATION

She was, she said, "bored to tears" with her new "freedom." When she attended a party for her old friend Mabel Mercer in the summer of 1977, she sang a few songs that so impressed her audience that the party led to a six-week stint at the Cookery in Greenwich Village, starting Oct. 10, 1977.

She was an immediate sensation. Crowds lined the block outside the Cookery waiting to get in. Her engagement was extended indefinitely and she used the nightclub as her base.

Shortly after her opening at the Cookery, Miss Hunter was commissioned by the movie director Robert Altman to record the soundtrack for his film "Remember My Name." Miss Hunter wrote two songs for the film and updated eight of her old numbers. When the film opened in Memphis in October 1978, Miss Hunter returned to Beale Street, where she was born, to be honored by the city fathers on what was proclaimed Alberta Hunter Day throughout Tennessee.

To the end, Miss Hunter lived up to the philosophy expressed in one of her songs: "Don't try to tame me," she sang, "let me have my fun. I'm having a good time living my life today because tomorrow I may die."

Glancing around at her audience, she would add, "and I ain't passin' nothin' by!"

Miss Hunter was married briefly to Willard Townsend, a waiter who later became a union official. After that marriage, she said, "I never gave marriage another thought." She had no children.

Her only survivor is a nephew, Samuel Sharpe Jr., of Denver. There will be no funeral.●

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

He has showed you, O man, what is good; and what does the Lord require of you but to do justice, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with your God.—Micah 6:8.

Righteous God, as the 99th Congress opens, we pray that the Senate in all that it is, thinks, says and does, be pleasing to Thee. Grant that it shall be a place of truth and justice and mercy, that in the milieu of a pluralistic society with thousands of agendas often conflicting, where compromise is necessary, expediency will not dominate. May the pressure of special interests and public clamor not have priority over truth and justice. Grant to each Senator wisdom and discernment to seek and to do what is right for the common good. In His name who was incarnate truth. Amen.

TRIBUTES TO FORMER SENATOR GEORGE D. AIKEN OF VERMONT

GEORGE AIKEN, A STATESMAN FROM VERMONT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas is honored to join his distinguished colleague, Mr. STAFFORD, in paying tribute to one of the Senate's most respected former Members, George Aiken.

As we begin this new session of Congress, it is befitting that we remember this man from Vermont. George Aiken was a dedicated representative of the people of his State. His hallmark was candor and honesty. In the long hours of Senate duty, George Aiken always maintained an unpretentious, thoughtful manner. But when it came to defending the dairy farmer, or any other matter of importance to Vermont, Senator Aiken was heard loud and clear.

George Aiken believed it was the duty of a Senator to represent the people of his State. He was not interested in publicity; just results. It is this commonsense approach we will remember.

We in the Senate are in debt to Vermont's George Aiken and the standards he set for us and for those who succeed us. As Americans, we are thankful for his service to our country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, George David Aiken of Putney, VT, who enriched the U.S. Senate with his service for 34 years until he retired in 1975, died in Vermont on November 29, 1984, while the Congress was not in session.

At his request, George Aiken was laid to rest in the soil of the State he loved so much, in a simple ceremony attended only by members of his family, with the eulogy delivered by his wife, Lola. There was no pomp or circumstance, for he wanted neither.

Still, I do not think he would object to our pausing for this brief point in time to remember him and to talk about him in this Chamber that was so much a part of his life for so long.

In the great compromise that helped to create our Republic, the Founding Fathers held that U.S. Senators should represent mountains and lakes and forest and farms as well as people.

The wisdom of that decision has been demonstrated many times in the life of this country, but never more than when it gave to this Nation the presence of George Aiken in the U.S. Senate.

About 6 weeks before he died, George Aiken was honored by the dedication of a simple plaque set into a rock in a clearing of a quiet spot in a Vermont forest that is part of what the 98th Congress set aside as the George D. Aiken Wilderness.

It was fitting action by the Congress, for this independent New Englander was a son of Vermont whose wisdom grew from his roaming of the hills and valleys of the Green Mountain State that he loved so much.

George Aiken was a man of many parts who retained old-fashioned values, even as he remained contemporary in every sense of the word.

He continued to list his occupation as "farmer." He insisted that being Governor and Senator was his avocation. What an avocation. And how lucky we were that he chose it, because he ennobled the calling of politics.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Indeed, George Aiken was born to politics. He once told an interviewer:

I think there was an Aiken in the State Legislature about as far back as they had state legislatures.

There have been Aikens in Vermont since 1780, when Deacon Edward Aiken settled on a farm high up in the hills of what is now the town of Windham, VT.

George Aiken followed his father into the family nursery business and farm and then into the Vermont Legislature to begin a public career that will endure as a monument of service and integrity to his State and Nation.

Although he was defeated "by a few votes" in his first bid for the Vermont House of Represenatives in 1923, George Aiken tried again with more success in 1931.

Thus began an unbroken string of election victories that made him speaker of the Vermont House of Representatives, Lieutenant Governor, Governor, and then U.S. Senator.

Through the years, his hair turned white; his collection of red neckties grew to outrageous proportions, and his fame and reputation spread across the land and across the oceans.

What never changed was his civility—an abiding sense of fairness and decency that over the years added a special influence to his opinions on great issues—and on small ones.

What also never changed were his puckish smile and impish manner that were just right for the role he was destined to play in the American political arena—a wise elder who remained always the patriot and never the partisan.

On his retirement from this body in 1975, George Aiken was the object of bipartisan accolade. Henry Jackson said the Vermonter should be enshrined as "a national treasure." Mike Mansfield, his old and dear friend of many years, noted that throughout his Senate career, George Aiken remained "true to himself, to his Nation and to his State."

Franklin D. Roosevelt was President when George Aiken came to the U.S. Senate and Gerald Ford was President when he left. He was fond of saying he supported Presidents when he thought they were right and opposed them when he thought they were wrong, without regard to party labels. And, he did just that.

He also said a lot of Presidents solicited his advice, but too often didn't follow that advice. George Aiken used to say that we probably would have been a lot better off if Presidents had more often followed his advice. And, he probably was right on that score.

But, Presidents and colleagues in the Congress often did follow his advice, and the Nation is the better for it. It would take more than is available here to list all his accomplishments, but some of his major legislative successes in the Senate include:

The St. Lawrence Seaway Act; the food stamp bill; the Food for Peace Act; the Water Facilities Act, which brought water systems to rural America; the Rural Development Act; the Farm Credit Act.

His last official legislative achievement is worthy of particular mention.

In 1974, Congress passed George Aiken's Eastern Wilderness Act, which designated 15 eastern national forest areas as additions to the national wilderness preservation system and established an additional 17 areas for further wilderness study.

Generations of Americans were thus guaranteed the opportunity to enjoy the benefits and delights of eastern forests that might otherwise have been lost to development forever.

A short time after passage of that law and after 34 years of service in the U.S. Senate that kept him from the orchard and wild flowers and berries, George Aiken headed back to Vermont.

This uncommon man, who combined greatness with humility, wisdom with simplicity and gentleness with strength, remarked as he prepared to return to his roots in Vermont:

I've never felt at home in Washington. No, no, Washington's not my home. Home's up on the mountain in Vermont where I always lived.

Few men better earned the right than George Aiken to return home to enjoy the part of the world he loved so much. And, where he was loved so much.

He lived out his last years in a house on a hill in Putney, VT, where his father had a farm at the turn of the century. And, when he died—in harmony with nature and shunning the use of artificial life-support apparatus—George David Aiken's house was still on a dirt road.

I ask unanimous consent that the several news articles and editorials be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIKEN: A LEGEND IN HIS OWN TIME

As Vermont's candidate for political legendry, George D. Aiken was the embodiment of the virtues that have come to be associated with the people of the state: fierce independence, Yankee wit and plain common sense.

To place him in the political spectrum is as difficult as describing the manifold facets of his character. He did not fit into the mold of conservative or liberal in the traditional sense of the word. George Aiken was simply George Aiken, a man who indeed represented all the people of the state he loved so well. And his political accomplishments lived on long after he bade farewell to his Senate colleagues in 1975, 34 years after he first took his seat in the chamber. He earned the title of dean of the Senate for his long and valued service several years before he retired.

In more than three decades in the nation's capital, he became the friend and confidant of several Republican and Democratic presidents. Aiken was at the White House in 1945 when Harry S. Truman was sworn in as president after the death of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. When the ceremony was over, Truman threw his arms around the senator and tearfully said, "I'm not big enough for the job." Aiken said he shared that feeling at the time. Years later, he remarked that Truman grew into the presidency.

Anecdotes about Vermont's homespun senator would fill several books. Colleagues sought him out when they wanted plain, blunt talk about the issues. And he did not disappoint them.

"There are some people whose advice is worth having," said Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield. "George is one of them." Aiken no doubt offered his trenchant comments on a number of issues to Mansfield during the friendly breakfasts they had over the two decades they spent in the Senate together. Theirs were contrasting philosophies—Aiken, the moderate Yankee from the Green Mountains, Mansfield, the Montana liberal—but their relationship apparently thrived on those differences and engendered mutual respect.

But there was more to Aiken's political career than the social life of the capital. He was a champion of rural electrification, and many's the Vermont farmer who today can thank the senator for the work he did to bring power lines to the house and the barn. He shepherded the passage of the bill to construct the St. Lawrence Seaway, which linked the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean and created significant changes in the nation's industrial heartland. He was the architect of the food stamp program to provide benefits to the nation's elderly and its low-income families. As author of the one-half of 1 percent rule, he guaranteed that Vermont and other small states would always receive a share of the federal largesse that was parcelled out from Washington.

Of the chief executives Aiken knew, he once said, "Every president has done some good but every one of them has made some mistakes and committed some sins."

During his years in the White House, President Lyndon B. Johnson often sought out Aiken for his advice. But their relationship cooled considerably after Aiken offered a no-nonsense peace plan in 1966 during the Vietnamese War. "The United States," he said, "should declare victory and get out." While some doubtlessly agreed with the idea, the administration was too preoccupied with the idea of achieving its own goal to appreciate the Vermont senator's homely wisdom. The war dragged on for eight more bloody and divisive years before another administration recognized the futility of the effort and withdrew from Vietnam. Had Johnson followed Aiken's advice, thousands of lives would have been spared and the country would not have had to endure the painful spectacle of Americans clashing with Americans on the issue of U.S. involvement in Southeast Asia.

Commenting on Aiken's suggestion for the pullout, a colleague said the Vermont senator was "neither a hawk nor a dove, but a wise old owl."

Delivering his valedictory to fellow senators in 1975, he chided them for their "unwillingness to assume the responsibility that goes with authority." Congress, he said, was bloated with an "unholy expansion of committees, subcommittees and staff personnel which has mushroomed to an unconscionable extent during the last decade." He called for a reduction in the salaries of the president and top officials in government.

Then George Aiken, lawmaker, lover of growing things, Vermonter to the core, left Washington for his home in Putney to putter with his plants and flowers and to write his memoirs. And he perhaps wrote his own epitaph in his autobiography when he said, "Looking out at the New Hampshire hills across the valley, I feel very small indeed. I know I am bigger than the viruses, the insects, the bees and the birds, but I had nothing to do with this arrangement. In my dictionary, the two biggest words are 'infinity' and 'eternity'; my mind cannot define these words but I do know that nothing is infinite but infinity and nothing is eternal but eternity. Now I must come back to the earth for a brief stay."

Even though he now has become part of the eternity he referred to, George Aiken will not be forgotten by those Vermonters who share rich memories of the man who in his lifetime became an integral part of the state's political legendry.

[From the Caledonia-Record, Nov. 20, 1984]

GEORGE AIKEN

All Green Mountain residents were saddened to learn of the death this week of George Aiken at the age of 92.

The great Vermont statesman who was born in Dummerston on Aug. 20, 1892, had the distinction during his long, civic-minded public career of serving as a state representative from his community, speaker of the State House of Representatives, Lieutenant-Governor, Governor and from 1941 to 1975 a United States Senator from the Green Mountain State.

He will undoubtedly be remembered for numerous things during those many years of public service including his call for American withdrawal from Vietnam which we believe became, in effect, the policy of the Nixon administration. And he will certainly be remembered as a man held in such high esteem by his fellow Vermonters that he was re-elected to his last term in the Senate in 1968 in a campaign in which he had the nomination of both parties and spent less than $30. And as area residents well know, he named our region the Northeast Kingdom.

But we think he will also be remembered as a truly wise Vermonter who continually made sense on a great many issues. To quote a passage from Aiken's book "Speaking from Vermont": "Bureaucracy is not and cannot be nearly as efficient or productive as ordinary competition. Disorganized governmental interference (hardly worthy of the name of regulation) results in a demand for unification of activity that can lead only to what many choose to call dictatorship. A law-making body is not trained for the purpose and legislative halls are not the place to develop sound business practices and decisions. Nor is a political dictatorship qualified to administer business rules and regulations to popular advantage. The future of business has two distinct alternatives; If it is 'protected' by regulation and government control, we face a static future. If it elects to and is allowed to assume risks in competition, it can lead to freedom and expansion."

These words are as relevant in the 1980's as when the book was copyrighted by Frederick A. Stokes Company in 1938.

GEORGE D. AIKEN

The death in Montpelier this morning of George D. Aiken—Vermont's elder statesman, adviser to Presidents, friend of the needy, and nurturer of wildflowers—has left Vermont with a loss unlike almost anything it has experienced before.

There have been many well-loved leaders in Vermont's history, but few as truly beloved as Vermont's former governor and longtime U.S. senator. His passing today at the age of 92 is nothing short of a death in the family for Vermont—the loss of a brother, a father and a grandfather combined into one.

Many Vermont leaders have had the capacity to say in a few words what it might take others volumes to express. But there have been few whose clarity of thought and brevity of words have had a greater impact on as many human lives and history.

There have been many Vermonters who have carried in their clipped accents, their dryness of wit, and the weathered lines of their faces some of the essence of Vermont and Vermonters. But there have been few who have managed to carry the whole essence there with more consistency and grace than "The Governor."

As Vermont unites as a family to mourn this irreplaceable loss today, perhaps the most fitting tributes to Sen. Aiken will be those that are the simplest:

That in serving in high places in Washington, George Aiken never lost sight of Vermonters.

That in rubbing elbows with the powerful, George Aiken never turned a deaf ear to the powerless.

That in this complex and often violent world, George Aiken put honesty first.

[From the Brattleboro Reformer, Nov. 20, 1984]

THE PASSING OF A LEGEND

In the space of a few weeks, this community has lost three men whose impact on the nation and the world was enormous.

Ellsworth Bunker was one of the 20th century's most gifted diplomats, whose skills at mediating conflict made him an ambassadorial legend from the Middle East to Panama.

In music, Marcel Moyse was in a realm by himself. He was not only one of the greatest of all flutists, but his teachings influenced generations of musicians in all parts of the world.

And now, George D. Aiken has died.

The presence of these three great men in Windham County—in Dummerston, Brattleboro and Putney—says a lot about the quality of life in this part of the world. Vermont, and Windham County, nourished them, just as their presence nourished us. We are better because they were our neighbors, but the whole world has suffered a triple loss because of their deaths.

Vermont was George Aiken's special world, despite his years of influence and power in Washington. There probably are few places in the United States where one man has made such an impact and such a difference, on the attitude and outlooks of a whole people.

He symbolized the sturdy independence of Vermonters, their frugality, their common sense and, most of all, their integrity.

His face was etched from Vermont marble, and his soul was formed by the hard-scrabble soil of the land and the hills. Like Vermont, his style was simple, unpretentious, and deeply compassionate. His influence in politics, in government, in his approach to both life and public service, has been so profound in this state that it virtually has become impossible to separate the man from the Vermont myth.

These qualities gave Senator Aiken his influence in Washington. It was rare even in his days to find, in the capital, a man of such unpretentious common sense. With few exceptions—including Sen. Patrick Leahy, who succeeded Aiken in the Senate and who probably is closest in political and human spirit to Aiken of any active Vermont politician—it is even more difficult in the phony, image-conscious Washington of 1984 to have a man of his caliber in public life.

Aiken's advice was wanted by a succession of presidents because, although he was a politician of few words, those words had enormous wisdom. Now presidents listen to "media advisers," pollsters and special interest groups with many axes to grind.

It was easy, in his later years, to concentrate on Aiken's homespun qualities. But it should never be overlooked that, in all of his political life, he was a very shrewd and ambitious politician who understood the nature and uses of great power, its force for good, and the possibility that it can be abused with terrifying consequences. He fought all his career against those abuses.

In life, George Aiken was a constant reminder of what politics, in its very best meaning, should be all about. His heritage is immense. Vermonters always seem to have held their politicians to the middle of the road and enlightened common sense standards that Aiken laid down in his long career. It's a safe bet those standards will be held on high for a long time to come. Governor Aiken's influence, and the momentum it gave to Vermont's way of political life, has been too great to diminish just because he's no longer going to be holding forth from Putney Mountain.

[From the Rutland Daily Herald]

GEORGE DAVID AIKEN

Vermonters aren't in the habit of elevating public officials to hero status, but when George D. Aiken died on Monday at the age of 92 following a long and distinguished political career he had reached legendary standing in the esteem and affection of the state's citizenry.

No other public figure of his time, and perhaps for many years before, was held in such high regard by the people of Vermont. Their opinion of him was repeatedly recorded at election time. Other politicians also won big majorities at the polls, but George Aiken enjoyed a degree of love and respect that set him apart.

He was honored for his many accomplishments in office, for his service to the state and nation and for his independence of thought and action. Early in his Senate career, he began to be cited as one of the 10 "best." By the time he retired from the U.S. Senate in 1974, he had acquired a national reputation for wisdom and common sense. It was a reputation that prompted a Senate colleague to say that he should be declared a "national treasure."

During the Vietnam War, he was neither a hawk nor a dove, but was called a "wise old owl" when he said the United States should declare a victory and get out.

When he began his political career, George Aiken's political philosophy has been described as a combination of 1890's populism and LaFollette progressivism. It was a brand of politics that made him a controversial figure during his years as governor and as a freshman senator when he called for closer regulation of public utilities and better supervision of state banks. He was almost alone in opposing lend-lease in the Senate before World War II.

Recently there has been a call among conservative Republicans for a return to organization politics in Vermont, a closed primary and state committee endorsement of candidates. Under such a system George Aiken would never have been a Republican governor or senator. He would have been expelled by the party, as some old guard Republicans wanted in the 1930's and 1940's.

There's a little question, if the conservatives had had their way, Vermont would have gone Democratic long before it did in 1958 and 1962.

Questions have been frequently asked about George Aiken's secret. Why was he so highly regarded and respected? One reason was that he remained George Aiken, the same unassuming, hardworking public official that he always had been. He liked people and they liked him in return.

After he retired from office and traveled the state with his wife, Lola, when he was much in demand at all kinds of state meetings and functions, his contacts with people were no different than they were when he was in office. Many of them didn't realize he was no longer a candidate.

When he retreated to his hillside home in Putney and made no bones about being glad to get out of Washington, there was never any hint of cutting himself off from the public and frequent appeals for his help.

He was a man of simple tastes who had a lifelong love of the land and who never lost his sense of humor. And he looked the part of the countryman with his shock of unruly white hair, craggy face and stocky figure.

He liked to refer to the Vermont farmer whose corn crop didn't turn out as well as he expected. "But then he didn't expect it would."

Long known for his understanding of and sympathy for the plight of the farmer, he was offhand about his farming experience. "The saddest day of my life," he would say, "was when my father found out I could milk a cow." He was known as the "best friend the farmer ever had in Congress."

The typical Vermonter, he said, was one who would return a neighbor's "nice-day" greeting by saying, "not bad, so far."

As a public speaker, he was no orator. He often seemed to ramble and hesitate before finding the right words to fit his thoughts. But he had an unlimited supply of original material whether he was talking to students at the University of Vermont or a large national gathering.

There was only one George Aiken. And, of course, there never will be another.

[From the Eagle Times, Claremont, NH]

LINCOLN'S HEIR

In the 1930s, George Aiken addressed a Lincoln's Day dinner in New York and told his Republican cohorts that the best thing that could be said about Lincoln was that he would be ashamed of the party that was honoring him.

It was basic Aiken. Biting wit, independence. He was not afraid to speak his mind whether it was about Joseph McCarthy's witch hunt or Lyndon Johnson's Vietnam policy.

In the 1960s, Aiken became a national folk hero when he issued his much quoted remedy for the Vietnam War. "The way to get out of Vietnam," the Vermont senator said, "is to declare victory and get out."

Aiken was a Republican to the core, yet he didn't hesitate as governor to institute the best of the New Deal ideas. As a senator, he sponsored a bill that was a forerunner of the food stamp program.

He tempered his common sense and frugality with concern. "How will this affect the people back home?" he would ask of any bill he was asked to vote on.

This farmer called to his state and nation's service was at ease chatting over lunch with the world's leaders.

Aiken set a very high standard for his predecessors from Vermont. Indeed, Aiken should be the measure by which all senators are judged.

No one has more embodied the values and ideals of Lincoln—that is the most fitting tribute that can be paid to Aiken.

MR. AIKEN IN WASHINGTON—THE SENATE'S "BALANCING WHEEL"

(Rutland Herald Managing Editor Stephen C. Terry was legislative assistant to Sen. George D. Aiken from 1969 to 1975.)

(By Stephen C. Terry)

The senior Senator from Vermont, George David Aiken, had just finished a 12-minute address to the world's most deliberative body and was asked to yield by Sen. Mike Mansfield, the Democratic majority leader.

Mansfield is recorded on Page 27524 of the Oct. 19, 1966 Congressional Record as saying: "Mr. President, as always, the distinguished senior senator from Vermont (Mr. Aiken) has given us a great deal to consider and some additional food for thought."

Mansfield, a longtime breakfast companion of Aiken, went on to praise a speech just delivered to the U.S. Senate on that crisp Washington morning in 1966.

The speech, known formally as "Vietnam Analysis: Present and Future," quickly became known in the nation's political history as the "Aiken Formula."

In the speech, Aiken proposed that the United States declare a military victory in South Vietnam and begin a gradual, phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from the country.

Over the years, the Aiken Formula has been widely quoted and offered as a potential solution for all political problems faced by Washington, whether they be foreign or domestic.

Through the shorthand of journalism, the Aiken speech was reduced to this simple bit of advice: "Declare Victory and Get Out."

What is so remarkable about the Aiken speech is that it was so soon in the Vietnam War. It was October 1966, when the United States had less than 150,000 troops in South Vietnam.

It was before the Tet Offensive in 1968 when American power in South Vietnam was humiliated causing President Johnson to order the bombing of North Vietnam, an event which further escalated the United States involvement in the Vietnam War. By the time the United States finally withdrew from South Vietnam in April 1975, nearly 10 years after the "Speech," the white-haired Republican senator from Vermont had secured a national reputation for himself.

Mention the name Sen. Aiken and usual response was "Oh, yes the senator who said to declare we won and get out."

How was it that a senator from a small, rural state with no leadership position in the 100-member body secured a position of national prestige? Part of the answer lies in the fact that Aiken, who by October 1966 was serving his fifth term in the U.S. Senate, sought no personal political power.

He was neither "hawk" nor "dove" in the Vietnam debate. He was, as the color cover of the Sunday New York Times Magazine declared in 1968: the "wise owl" of the Senate.

Aiken's role in the U.S. Senate was perhaps best described by former Sen. Abraham Ribicoff, D-Conn., when he called Aiken the Senate's "balancing wheel."

He was able to balance off the interest of the conservatives and liberals and offer instead a "common sense" solution that helped to break legislative logjams. An example was the historic 1964 civil rights debate in which the Senate was deadlocked over a public accommodations section of the proposed legislation. Aiken proposed the "Mrs. Murphy clause" which stated that the civil rights law did not apply in cases where four or less units were offered for rent. Aiken said this would let "Mrs. Murphy," a widow, rent out rooms without coming under the jurisdiction of the federal civil rights act.

It was the solution that broke the logjam, and for the first time since the Civil War, the Senate passed a major civil rights law over the opposition of the southern bloc.

So great was Sen. Aiken's influence in the Senate that Jack Anderson, one of the leading muckraking journalists in Washington wrote:

"His independence and his integrity are such that his voice is heard in both parties, and he does not hesitate to endorse Democratic programs that he believes are worthwhile."

Aiken also did not hesitate to stand up against his own party when in 1952 he was one of six Republicans to sign a "Declaration of Conscience" which was written by Sen. Margaret Chase Smith of Maine. The statement condemned the red-baiting tactics of Sen. Joseph McCarthy, R-Minn.

Aiken's independent streak was legendary in the Senate. It began within months after he was sworn in 1941 when he was one of the few senators to oppose President Franklin Roosevelt.

America was at the brink of World War II, and Roosevelt was pushing the Lend-Lease legislation which Aiken viewed as a backdoor way to involve the United States in the war in Europe. He saw Lend-Lease as vesting unlimited authority in the hands of the executive branch in making international agreements and bypassing Congress in the process.

Aiken opposed the legislation, saying he did not want to return to Vermont to look into the empty eyes of mothers whose sons were sent to fight a far-off war without the consent of Congress.

Aiken was his "own man," and he quickly gained a reputation among lobbyists that he could not be bought or pushed into a position that he didn't believe.

Aiken had one rule in his votes in the U.S. Senate: How will it affect "folks at home?"

He was a Republican, but in Washington this translated to liberal Republican when compared to the Tafts and the Hickenloopers—the "Old Guard" Republicans he used to call them.

In 1947, Arthur Krock wrote in the New York Times that many of Aiken's Republican colleagues thought he should be a New Deal Democrat. An analysis of the roll-call votes in 1947 showed that of the 123 roll calls, Aiken voted with Republican majorities only 21 times, against them 82 times. He was paired, or did not vote, 20 times.

This independent voting streak was Aiken's symbol during his Senate career which spanned from 1941 to 1975. By the time he retired from the Senate in January 1975, Aiken was the dean of the Senate by serving longer than anyone else. In all that time, he shunned party leadership positions because he never wanted to follow any party line.

A major reason for Aiken's independent streak was that he represented Vermont, a state which by 1968, when Aiken ran for his last Senate term, revered the Putney fruit farmer. When he ran unopposed in the general election in 1968, he spent $17.09 for his last campaign. Aiken remained politically invincible in Washington because he never forgot Vermont and the people who elected him.

At the time of his death, he lived in the town where he was born in 1892. He lived out his last years on West Hill in Putney, the hill where his father had a farm at the turn of the century. And when he died he still lived on a dirt road.

Aiken often remarked that he and former President Harry S Truman had the same problem: waking up early every morning. He said, like Truman, his was caused by having to get up early morning as a youngster to milk the family cow.

The old habit was never overcome. The result was that Aiken would get to work at Room 358 in the Old Senate Office Building at 6:45 a.m. On his way to work, he would stop on the Capitol lawn to feed the pigeons and squirrels peanuts, which he would buy in bulk to keep his friends "on welfare," as he would say.

By 7 a.m., Aiken was at his desk in the ornate Senate office building which was equipped with a marble fireplace (it never worked) that had Vermont birch logs in it. Behind his chair was a huge wall map of the world. In front of his desk, hanging over the fireplace, was a photograph of the Vermont State House where he served as governor of Vermont from 1936 to 1941. There was only one window in his own personal office and this overlooked the Senate courtyard. In front of the window was a bronze bust of Vermont's poet laureate, Robert Frost. More than one visitor remarked that the Frost bust had a strong resemblance to Aiken.

Aiken's desk was usually very clean, but in the later years it contained a curious plastic bag. In the bag were little pieces of pellets which in reality were dried cow manure. He used to shock some visitors by asking them if they would like some breakfast. "Just pour milk over them and they will be pretty good," he would say with a chuckle.

But the dried cow manure pellets, which were produced at Beltsville, Md., the National Agricultural Research Center, were a symbol of his life-long interest and work for agriculture. In the 34 years he served in the Senate, he was a member during all that time of the Senate Committee on Agriculture & Forestry, an important committee for a rural, dairy state.

After a quick read of all the Vermont newspapers in the morning, he then would look over all the morning mail.

By 7:55 a.m. it was time for breakfast with Sen. Mansfield. For more than 20 years, Aiken and Mansfield, another early riser, shared coffee and English muffins. The Aiken-Mansfield breakfast became one of those special Senate institutions. These sessions never lasted more than 20 minutes, but they were very important for both men. Mansfield kept Aiken abreast of Senate developments, and Aiken served as Mansfield's eyes and ears for Senate trends. The breakfasts were private, with only Lola Aiken, the Aiken's long administrative assistant and by 1967, his wife, permitted at the table.

Aiken's connections with Mansfield, the Senate's most important leader, was a major source of Aiken's influence in the Senate.

It was at this breakfast that Aiken gave Mansfield an advance copy of his 1966 Vietnam speech. By engaging Aiken in a colloquy after the speech, Mansfield guaranteed that it would be noticed by the Senate press gallery. The October 1966 speech was noticed, since it ran on page one of the New York Times.

After his breakfast, Aiken would begin his day-long meetings of Senate committees and work on the Senate floor. In between were sandwiched meetings with Vermonters, either in his ofice or in the waiting room of the U.S. Senate.

If there wasn't a night session of the Senate, Aiken's day would end at 5:30 p.m. If he didn't have a social engagement at night, he would be in bed by 11 p.m.

Whenever possible, Aiken would return to Vermont. These trips were a tonic for Aiken. He would travel throughout the state, paying calls on old friends and making sure to eat out at busy lunch counters or restaurants. Most of all he liked to be at his Putney home where he would tend to his garden.

It was on one of these trips home in 1964 that Aiken found out that communities in Addison County were having difficulty getting enough drinking water. Farmers were hauling water for their cows, and women weren't able to wash their clothes at home because of water shortages. Aiken decided that the federal government should help and introduced legislation instructing the Farmers Home Administration to make loans and grants to rural communities to develop water systems.

The legislation was opposed by President Johnson as too costly. In a typical example of how Aiken worked in the Senate, he went to work convincing almost every member of the wisdom. In short order, Aiken had over half of the Senate as sponsors. That was enough for a canny vote-counter like Lyndon Johnson, who ordered his Department of Agriculture to change its position and back the legislation. When the bill passed, Lyndon Johnson held an elaborate bill-signing ceremony in the East Room of the White House in October 1965. In signing the bill, Johnson acknowledged that Aiken's personal influence was the reason the bill was passed into law. The first rural water system in the nation was in the Tri-Town District of Shoreham, Addison and Bridport.

The same persistence by Aiken led to the creation of the food stamp program. Aiken first offered the legislation in 1943 when the Vermonter offered legislation to distribute surplus food commodities to poor people. It wasn't until 1961 that the federal food stamp legislation was approved as a pilot program. (As a result Barre was one of the first places in the nation to test the food stamp program.)

Aiken's legislative achievements run the gamut of foreign and domestic policy. He was one of the principal sponsors of the Food for Peace, the program which makes available to foreign countries U.S. agricultural surpluses. He was a prime mover in the legislation that authorized federal government grants in building libraries for state and local governments. He sponsored legislation that created the Land and Water Conservation Fund, a program that provided money for protecting small watersheds, as well as creating wilderness areas in the East. He was also a prime mover in the development of the civilian nuclear power program, as well as the development of the St. Lawrence Seaway which resulted in low-cost power for two generations for Vermonters.

Aiken continually resisted efforts by the executive branch of government to usurp the powers of Congress. It was often a losing battle, as the power of Congress diminished steadily after World War II.

While Aiken's legislative accomplishments during his 34-year tenure were many, his most important achievement was that he commanded the respect of the Senate. When he spoke, the Senate listened.

A hushed tone would settle over the Senate press gallery as the word that "Aiken is up" would flash through the press gallery. Unlike many politicians who live and die by the press, Aiken rarely was perturbed about press coverage. He said that as long as they spelled his name right, he would not complain—and he rarely did.

He was always available to the press. In turn, the media was good to Aiken, and his every pronouncement commanded coverage, another source of his power in the Senate.

Thus when his Senate career was winding down, Aiken uttered one of the most memorable phrases in the whole debate over impeachment of President Nixon. It was Nov. 7, 1973, and the country was divided over whether to impeach Nixon because of Watergate crimes. Aiken, then 81, took the floor. His voice was not as strong as it once was, but his mind was sharp. He warned the Senate and the nation that the long debate over impeachment was hurting the country and making the nation look weak worldwide.

Aiken's terse advice about Nixon was to quote a fellow Vermonter:

"Either impeach him or get off his back." This speech helped to crystalize the debate over the impeachment issue.

During his last three years in the Senate, Aiken kept a weekly diary of his life.

His last entry sums up much about the man, who became a political legend in Vermont.

"Putney, Vermont—Week ending Jan. 2, 1975:

At the end of this week, L.P.A. (Lola Pierotti Aiken) and I left Washington for good after having been there thirty-four years, lacking one week. My retirement income amounts to more than my paycheck for the last few years. I could have added 7.4 percent to this by resigning before midnight on Dec. 31. I did not choose to do so, because I have always felt I should carry out contracts in full. When I came to Washington, I lost a week in the Senate because I insisted on completing my term as governor of Vermont. I have never been sorry that I did this.

When we got to the house on the mountain in Putney we found that the neighbors had cleaned the snow off the steps. Now, instead of looking out of the window and seeing the Capitol and the Washington Monument, we see Mt. Monadnock and the New Hampshire hills in the near distance, and the nearby hills of Vermont covered with one to two feet of snow. There are no deer in our yard, since they have all gone back to their own yard in the woods, but the chickadees and blue jays were on hand to meet us. Although we miss our many friends in Washington, Vermont is a welcome relief from the atmosphere in our nation's capital for the last few years.

It is good to be home.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, George Aiken, my predecessor in this office, was elected to the U.S. Senate the year I was born and served here until I arrived in the Senate 10 years ago this month.

I mention that, Mr. President, because Governor Aiken has been really a part of my life, as he has been a part of the lives of most Vermonters for as long as we can remember. Certainly there was never a time when I can recall when George Aiken was not a U.S. Senator from Vermont.

In fact, throughout my childhood, two things remained constant. It snowed in the winter and George Aiken was the Governor—a title he always preferred to the rather grand-sounding title of "Senator."

Governor Aiken would be uncomfortable if he knew what we are about today. His funeral in Vermont was private and simple, as was his eulogy of his wife, Lola, given on Thanksgiving Day in Vermont.

According to Lola, the Governor used to complain that he never had a say about his birthday, but he could sure do something about his funeral.

And his last instructions were to keep it private, simple, within the family, and with no disruption of public life whatsoever. And that is exactly what happened.

And probably the last thing he would want is a eulogy on the Senate floor—but many Vermonters would agree that it is the thing to do—and this is the first, and the last argument I will ever win from a man who I respected.

The greatness of George Aiken is that we can still learn from him, and that future generations of Vermonters will worship his memory no less than we do here today.

Governor Aiken's style was blunt and to the point.

He summed up a Nation's frustration with the Vietnam war: "Let's declare victory and get out."

During the trials of Watergate, he was equally adept at coming to the point. "Impeach him or get off his back," he said.

In 1937, the New York Times profiled the Governor as a dark-horse possibility as the Republican candidate for President of the United States.

For a man who once spent $17 total on a reelection campaign to the U.S. Senate, I am convinced that had he been nominated, the Governor would have run a Presidential campaign in probably four figures tops, and giving our party a run for its money.

He had a marvelous sense of humor.

Although described as a farmer, he may have embarked upon the profession reluctantly.

He once said: "The saddest day of my life was when my father found out I could milk a cow."

Born in Putney, VT, on August 20, 1882, he attended a one-room schoolhouse in West Putney and once quipped he was the only person he knew with a $7 million marker erected over his birthplace. He was referring to the construction of the interstate highway over the cellar hole of the house in which he was born.

The recent outpouring of tributes from the greatest statesmen of our century of the humblest Vermonter illustrates the breadth of Governor Aiken's ability to reach all Americans of all persuasions with commonsense expressed in common language.

Governor Aiken sort of translated a complex world into terms that were understood by everyone.

We can all learn from his life and that is probably the greatest tribute anyone can give to one of his peers, let alone one of his fellow statesmen.

No; the Governor would not have thought much of our taking the time to eulogize him here today, but we do it for ourselves as much as for him.

We are proud of Governor Aiken and his long service to this body. We are proud to have known him, to have served with him, and to have learned from him.

Mr. President, just preceding me, the distinguished Senator from Vermont, Senator STAFFORD, my respected and beloved colleague, spoke at length about Governor Aiken. He went through the list of some of the major legislative achievements of Governor Aiken and so I will not repeat them here again.

But Senator STAFFORD, as I did, referred more to the personal attributes of the late Senator from Vermont. And it is those attributes, I think, that we, as Vermonters, will always remember because they were of the essence of Vermont for so many years. As I have traveled around the country, when people have spoken of their image of Vermont, the image they gave was of George David Aiken.

May he rest in peace knowing he has served his country and his State as well as any man can. He will be remembered with love and affection as long as there is a State of Vermont.

Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I am pleased to yield to the distinguished Senator from Maryland, Senator MATHIAS.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Vermont for yielding to me, and I thank him for arranging for the Senate to have this time to remember George Aiken.

Mr. President, I am particularly grateful for the opportunity to recall George Aiken's service in the Senate, because to me he was a friend, he was a mentor, and he was an example. His memory—I might even say his spirit—is very close because the office that I occupy in the Capitol was for many years George Aiken's office. And, by a rather singular coincidence, the office that I occupy in the Russell Building is the only office that George Aiken ever occupied in his entire 34 years of Senate service.

In his frugal New England way, he thought that office was an adequate one, so why put the taxpayers to the expense, why put himself to the trouble, of moving around on Capitol Hill? It was all right as it was and he stayed there. And I believe that the carpets and the telephone equipment and all of the apparatus of the office when I moved in was pretty much as it had been when he moved in.

He had a gentle and self-depreciating sense of humor. On my invitation, he came to Maryland and spoke to a group. At the conclusion of his speech, the dinner committee had arranged to make a presentation to him. And in that part of Maryland—my native county, Frederick County—one of the highest honors that can be conferred and one of the most desirable presents that can be given is an old Maryland ham, well cured, well smoked, succulent and delicious. But I will never forget George Aiken, with his impish grin, standing up, cradling this old Maryland ham in his arms and saying, "Now I know just what you think about me."

George Aiken's career was, in my opinion, an example of the very essence of the U.S. Senate—the essence of what it means to serve in the U.S. Senate. The basic elements of his career, as the Senator from Vermont has just said, were trust, confidence, and integrity.

I think his famous friendship with the then majority leader, the Senator from Montana, Senator Mansfield, was a case in point. They had such a close and intimate friendship that they could constantly exchange views, opinions, ideas and information without any reserve and with absolute confidence that it would be confidential. I have to believe that the interests of the people of the United States were advanced by this close and confidential relationship between two of the leaders of the Congress.

They had breakfast every morning, early, much earlier than most Senators even arrive on Capitol Hill. They did not eat in the Senate restaurant, they ate in the cafeteria, again an example of Senator Aiken's frugal habits and ways.

I think, myself, that the right of privacy is a very important and essential right of every American, but if I ever had a desire to breach the right of privacy it would have been to tape those breakfast conversations of George Aiken and Mike Mansfield—those two laconic, wise, witty philosophers of American politics, both of them very short on words, very long on common sense, whose conversations must have been classics in American politics.

But I would not want to give the idea that George Aiken was a cracker-barrel philosopher, because he was certainly much more than that. He was a leader. And I saw him lead on many occasions. I remember one night during some controversy when President Nixon asked a group of us to come to the White House. We all assembled in the library on the ground floor and there was a crackling fire in the hearth, as President Nixon liked. We gathered around and we discussed whatever the question of the day was. Then there was a sort of silence in the room, as everybody tried to gather together to come up with a consensus. And it was George Aiken who moved in and set the tone and provided us with direction.

He was the quintessential New Englander.

The world will certainly remember for a very long time his five-word prescription for resolving the problem of Vietnam: "Declare victory and come home."

He was, as the Senator from Vermont has said, a naturalist. He was more than a casual naturalist. It was a matter of enormous personal interest to him, commitment and dedication.

He carried this interest to others in conversations and speeches in every way that he could. He wrote a book on wildflowers that has become a classic, and he brought this love of nature with him to Washington.

He found ways to express it even here on Capitol Hill. One of the charming things about George Aiken was to watch him walking out onto the lawns of the Capitol with a little paper bag full of grain and to watch him standing there distributing the grain to the pigeons on Capitol Hill. He could even find something to love about pigeons. He studied them with great care. He got to know the personalities of individual pigeons. He could describe what the reactions of a particular pigeon would be.

Mr. President, I have to say to you that I believe George Aiken got more satisfaction out of his friendship with some of the pigeons than he did with some of the people he had to do business with.

We think of him as a Senator, but his wife, Lola, his wonderful, loyal, devoted wife Lola, always called him Governor. That, of course, was a reminder that for George Aiken there was life before the Senate. He did serve as a distinguished Governor of Vermont. He had been chief executive of that State and in that role first won the confidence of the people of Vermont.

But for George Aiken there was also life after the Senate. He was a public leader, a public figure, in Vermont as long as he lived.

The Aiken Lectures at the University of Vermont were founded in his honor and were a source of pleasure and satisfaction to him. He made it a custom to open the Aiken Lectures and to introduce the speaker chosen for the year. He always did it with the wit and humor that characterized him throughout his entire career.

His wife, Lola, was a companion and support in his efforts through many of those years. I know that she finds that the days are empty since his death, but I hope that she will find comfort in the knowledge that she was a principal support and comfort to a very great man and a great Senator.

Mr. President, I again thank the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD] for yielding to me at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I want to express my appreciation, and I am sure that of Senator LEAHY and the people of Vermont, to Senator MATHIAS for the very articulate and touching speech he has just made in memory of our most able and distinguished leader from Vermont, George Aiken.

Mr. President, there may be some others who are listening in their offices who wish to speak in connection with George Aiken. If there are, I hope they might make their way to the Senate Chamber since the hour will be running out in about 30 minutes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, at this point I yield to the very able Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

THE PASSING OF GEORGE D. AIKEN

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it was with great sadness that I learned of the death last year of my friend and former colleague, George D. Aiken, who served with distinction for more than 30 years as Senator from Vermont.

George Aiken was one of those rare individuals who rose above partisan politics and provided conscientious leadership for Republicans as well as Democrats, both conservative and liberal. The popularity and respect he achieved in the Senate was evidenced by the fact that during the 1970's he chaired a Foreign Relations Subcommittee although he was a Republican and the Senate was controlled by Democrats at the time.

George Aiken was a tireless worker and an outstanding and effective spokesman for rural Americans. Despite his success and fame, he never forgot his roots.

My prayers and sympathies are with his wife, Lola.

She was one of the best liked and most respected of the Senate wives. All Senators and their wives who knew her have always had the highest regard and affection for Lola.

Mr. President, I shall always remember George Aiken as a thoughtful and kindly man. He is sorely missed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I thank my colleague [Mr. LONG] for his comments about my respected former colleague. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

GEORGE AIKEN

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I wish to express my condolences and sadness on the departing of our late colleague to his family and loved ones.

When I was first elected to the House of Representatives in the 91st Congress, I came to the Congress long on enthusiasm and short on any kind of legislative experience of working with the legislative institutions in this city. Shortly after I got here, being, an apple grower and on the Agricultural Committee in the other body, I discovered, much to my consternation, the enthusiasm with which the Washington bureaucracy was trying on invoke OSHA. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration was causing a great deal of consternation among the orchard people all across this country. Immediately, I engaged in a dispute over how the regulations should be.

About the time, as I said, that by my enthusiasm, I had gotten myself out ahead of what might be accomplished or not, and everybody was jumping on me, I said to some people who were working with me: "Gee, maybe I have gone too far." About that time, my telephone rang and on that telephone was none other than George Aiken, himself, residing in his home at that time in an orchard and commuting here to Washington. He gave me a great deal of encouragement and we became fast friends after that first phone call.

I just wished to share with my colleagues the enduring respect I held for the late George Aiken and, best of all, to extend that to his family.

I thank the distinguished chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator on behalf of myself and my colleague [Mr. LEAHY] and the people of our State for his kind comments about Senator Aiken, who served with such distinction and so well for so long.

Mr. President, next the list of eulogies for George Aiken, I see the assistant majority leader [Mr. SIMPSON].

51-059 O-86-23 (Pt. 1)

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, if I may have 2 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be happy to yield whatever time within reason the Senator wishes.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thank the Senator. I shall take my old seat in the Senate and he may retain my present one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

GEORGE AIKEN

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I met George Aiken through my father in this Chamber, this very location of the Chamber. My father and George Aiken served together here. My father was U.S. Senator from Wyoming in the early sixties. He and George were very loving friends. They served here and enjoyed each other's company.

Senator Aiken was an extraordinary gentleman, and extraordinary person. He had the reputation that he obtained here, and the respect of his colleagues, which I am sure has been commented on many times as Senator STAFFORD has controlled the time in which we pay our tributes to him.

I wish to say that I admired his sharpness of mind and wit, his intellect, and his fine insight, and his rare good humor, in his craggy Vermont twang. Indeed, he had that.

He was a gentleman, and he made this institution better for his presence. On behalf of my father, who is now 87, and myself, I pay my respects to this remarkable gentleman from Vermont. I extend my regret that I did not come to know him better, but certainly he lives in the minds of all my family. God bless his memory.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, on behalf of the people of Vermont and my colleague [Mr. LEAHY], I appreciate the tribute that Senator SIMPSON has delivered to the memory of George Aiken.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, last November 19, our country lost one of its greatest and quietest leaders. George Aiken, the quintessential Yankee, served the State of Vermont for three and a half decades in the U.S. Senate and represented the conscience of America in this body for all of that time.

I consider myself particularly fortunate to have had the opportunity to know Governor Aiken, as he preferred to be called, and to learn the greatness of his ways firsthand. My first years as a Member of the Senate, from 1971-75, were the final years of the Governor's long career here. As a new Member of this body, I was a willing witness to Aiken's work, which was based on common sense, decency, and a genuine devotion to his State and the people of Vermont. He taught me and countless others that honesty, integrity, and diligence in the pursuit of them are the sole criteria by which to judge a man or a nation. He practiced each of these virtues daily and, in doing so, contributed to this institution considerably and made all of us who had the privilege to serve with him better Senators.

I urge my colleagues to recall Senator George Aiken and his service. Further, I encourage those who are not familiar with this great man, who has been absent from this Chamber for 10 years, to learn about his life and simple wisdom. His "Senate Diary" makes good reading.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate is today honoring one of the great Senators of our time, the late Senator from the State of Vermont, George Aiken. During his service to the Senate and to our country he demonstrated leadership as well as vision. He leaves behind not only a legend, he leaves us with lessons of insight to the future.

As an Alaskan, I feel a special affinity for Senator Aiken. He was one of the few who truly understood the complex problems, issues, and challenges facing the then territory of Alaska, Canada, and the United States. I remember so well the debate on H.R. 7999, the bill to provide for the admission of the State of Alaska into the Union. In June 1958, while the Senate was considering this legislation, Senator Aiken spoke on the issue of United States/Canada relations. He spoke of mutual defense and the North American air defense command system, he noted the importance of trade between Canada and the United States including exports and business investments. He spoke of tourism between nations. Senator Aiken, in 1958 understood the importance of Canada's oil development and strategic mineral identification.

Senator Aiken was right on target. Alaska became a State. Relations between Canada and the United States have become more and more intertwined in the past three decades. Petroleum has literally shifted the balance of power in the world in terms of defense strategy and capital investment. The relations between the United States and Canada continue as we explore the possibilities of tapping natural gas and strategic minerals in the arctic regions of Alaska and Canada.

Many will expound on the numerous contributions that Senator Aiken made to this body and our Nation. Some will note the fact that he was in fact the Republican dean of the Senate. Others will note the fact that as a Republican in a Democratic-controlled Senate in the late 1950's and early 1960's, that he chaired the Subcommittee on Canada. Finally, some Members of the Senate will recognize Senator Aiken as the founder of the United States/Canadian Interparliamentary Union.

Senator Aiken was a great Senator. He set an example for all of us to follow. In fact, he paved the way for future Members of the Senate to enhance relations with their Canadian counterparts. I have had the privilege of participating in many of the United States/Canadian Interparliamentary Conferences. They are extremely valuable.

Many of us in the Senate strive to be the best we can possibly be in both our service to our respective States, but also to the institution of the Senate. Senator Aiken set his example through his actions. The consequence of selflessness on his part on many occasions turned into a net plus for everyone. The best example is his decision to give up 13 years of seniority on the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee to take a seat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Fortunately, this selfless move ultimately resulted in improved United States/Canadian relations as well as other significant statements relating to U.S. foreign policy.

A decade has passed since Senator Aiken served in this body, but his reputation lives on. He taught those of us who served here with him the lesson or looking at issues through the lens of the future and through the consequence of action. The State of Vermont is fortunate to have such a long tradition of Senators with not only strength, but sensitivity; and not only insight, but vision.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE U.S. SENATOR GEORGE D. AIKEN OF VERMONT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to an outstanding public servant and remarkable individual, my good friend, former Senator George D. Aiken of Vermont, who passed away on November 19, 1984, at the age of 92.

To his wife, Lola; daughters, Mrs. Dorothy Morse, Mrs Marjorie Cleverly, and Mrs. Barbara Jones; and other family, I extend my deepest sympathy.

Senator Aiken, who retired as dean of the U.S. Senate in 1975, was unlike any public servant I have ever known. For nearly 20 years, I had the privilege of serving with him in this body. Having had the opportunity as a Senator to work with him from both the Democratic and Republican sides of the Senate Chamber aisle, I can attest that George D. Aiken fit no political mold. He was his own man, and spoke his mind without hesitation—and without apology. Regardless of how unpopular his positions may have been, he unswervingly stood behind his convictions, and for this reason earned the respect and admiration of many. He was an American first and foremost. Indeed, for Senator Aiken, partisan politics took a back seat to what he deemed to be right and decent for all citizens.

Although he did not enter politics until he was 39, Senator Aiken enjoyed a productive and effective career in public service. Beginning in 1930, he served as a member of the Vermont House of Representatives, and became its speaker in 1933. Two years later, Senator Aiken was elected Lieutenant Governor of Vermont, and became that State's Governor in 1937.

While Governor, George Aiken's independent spirit won national attention when, in 1938, he urged his fellow Republicans to stop their "hate Roosevelt campaign" and begin to support the President for the good of the Nation. In 1940, when President Roosevelt was elected to his third term in the White House, Governor Aiken was chosen by the people of Vermont to serve in the U.S. Senate.

Once in the Senate, George Aiken quickly earned a reputation for his straightforwardness on all issues. Of particular concern to Senator Aiken was the future of the American farmer. Regarded as a pioneer in the commercial cultivation of wild flowers, and the author of several books and articles on horticulture, Senator Aiken fought diligently to protect our agrarian interests. As the ranking member of the Senate Agriculture Committee, he wielded considerable influence to help his fellow farmers.

Senator Aiken, however, did not limit his outspoken manner exclusively to domestic matters. A prominent member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Vermont was perhaps one of the most vehement critics of the Vietnam war. One had to respect the views of this levelheaded man who quickly recognized and contended that the United States had no business being in a war which its leaders did not intend to win.

Commonsense and humanitarian concern dictated every decision Senator Aiken made. His fair and honest approach to life and the duties of public office will continue to stand as an example to public servants at every level of government. Although he loved serving the fine people of Vermont, he also missed working on the land he loved so much. To the regret of his colleagues, yet to his personal joy, at the conclusion of the 93d Congress, he returned to Vermont to continue his horticultural pursuits.

Mr. President, Senator George David Aiken never felt completely at peace anywhere but in Vermont. He expressed this sentiment well one time, saying: "I've never felt at home in Washington. Home's up on the mountain in Vermont where I always lived." After a lifetime of serving Vermont, our Nation, and mankind, Senator George Aiken is home to stay. May he forever rest in peace.

IN MEMORY OF GEORGE DAVID AIKEN

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, last November, I was saddened to learn of the death of Senator George David Aiken. I express my condolences to his wife, Lola Pierotti Aiken, his three daughters Dorothy Morse, Marjorie Cleverly, and Barbara Jones, and his grandchildren and great grandchildren. I join others in this Chamber who served with him in honoring his memory and in feeling a true sense of loss at his passing.

When George David Aiken took a seat in the U.S. Senate in 1941, he already had a record of public service that would have satisfied most mortals. He had served two terms as Governor of his beloved State of Vermont, as well as a State legislator, the speaker of the Vermont House of Representatives, and Lieutenant-Governor.

But at the age of 48, Mr. Aiken came to this Chamber to serve not only the people of his State, but also the people of the United States.

For the next 34 years of his life, Senator Aiken worked tirelessly for causes in which he believed—and for the best interests of our Nation and its people.

In this Chamber Senator Aiken fought for the St. Lawrence Seaway, advocated Medicare, helped create the Food-for-Peace Program, and was instrumental in enacting the Food Stamp Program to combat hunger in America. He fought for civil rights and worked for peace.

Preferring to operate behind the scenes, Senator Aiken avoided the limelight. But his colleagues watched and admired him as he quietly advocated, supported, and built. As the Christian Science Monitor pointed out, "because of . . . (Mr. Aiken's) reputation for quiet competence the Senate listens when he does speak."

It was more than his accomplishments, however, that made Mr. Aiken an effective Senator and a great American. He was one of those rare people who could influence by force of personality. His long-time friend and breakfast mate, Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield, once called him a "rock of integrity." Said Senator Mansfield, "Any position Aiken takes automatically becomes respectable just because it's held by George Aiken."

The strength of that personality, and the depth of that integrity traveled far beyond this Chamber. Senator Aiken was one of the people whom President Kennedy called upon for a private consultation after the Bay of Pigs failure.

As a wise and effective Senator, Mr. Aiken could accept the future, even when it was disagreeable to him. "Some people throw up their hands when they see a trend bearing down on them," Senator Aiken said, "but I believe it is better to jump on the trend and try to guide it rather than being run over." For this reason, he urged his Republican colleagues to accept the best of the New Deal.

In his pursuit of peace, perhaps, came Senator Aiken's greatest achievements. He served as an influential member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and as a representative to the United Nations. In these capacities Senator Aiken demonstrated that there are universal truths that can overcome international differences. As Senator Mansfield recalled, "At times our relations with foreign dignitaries would be a little strained, but George would go up and start talking trees and flowers and things, and the ice would be broken."

Upon Senator Aiken's death last November, Senator PATRICK LEAHY, who had filled Mr. Aiken's seat on his retirement, stated that his predecessor "reflected what's best of Vermont." That was certainly true. George Aiken also reflected what was best of American Government. He was widely respected as an independent Senator who stood strongly for the principles he felt were fundamental; he was loyal to his party, but he placed his country first.

George David Aiken loved what he once called "this big, sometimes blundering, but basically idealistic nation," and he served it well. We mourn his passing, but we celebrate the memory of a true public servant.

GEORGE AIKEN—GIANT OF THE GREEN MOUNTAIN STATE

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, George Aiken served 34 years as a U.S. Senator, but he was always known as the "Guv." Actually, neither "Governor," which he preferred, nor "Senator," which is how almost all of us knew him, were adequate descriptions, because George Aiken always thought of himself as Ambassador to Washington from the sovereign State of Vermont. As he once explained, "I've always represented my State first, then the Nation, and then the rest of the world." With his bright ties covered with red clover—the Vermont State flower—and with his down-to-Earth Yankee common sense, he was perfect in the part.

When he retired from the Senate in 1975, he went back to Putney, less than a mile from the place he was born. But in spirit he had never really left Vermont. Throughout his brilliant career in public service, George Aiken stayed close to his Green Mountain roots. He measured his words carefully, but he had enormous influence—Abe Ribicoff, our former colleague from Connecticut, once described him as the "balance wheel of the Senate."

He had a remarkable instinct for the middle ground, and an uncommon ability to make sense out of complex issues. He became a legend in his own time with the Aiken peace plan on Vietnam: "Declare victory and come home." And that simple, eloquent phrase helped us to end the war.

George Aiken was renowned not just as a thinker, but as a listener. He was a confidante and respected counselor to Presidents of both parties for a generation. When President Kennedy invited him to the White House immediately after the Bay of Pigs, Senator Aiken said that the President was no more to blame than he was, that President Kennedy "just wanted to go to confession." During his years in the Senate, my brother's office was next to Senator Aiken's, and he valued his advice on almost every issue of foreign and domestic policy. Later, as President, he sent George Aiken to Moscow as a member of the first nuclear test ban delegation.

One lesson that all of us learned from George Aiken was the importance of taking the long view on public policy issues. He rarely made final judgments on passing situations. Once, when I asked him what he thought about a particularly controversial bill, his response was only, "Looks OK—now."

Above all, for George Aiken, politics was an honorable profession. He was totally independent, impossible to pigeonhole, and fundamentally nonpartisan. He was appalled by the increasing role of special interest groups and the surge of money in politics. In 1968, he won reelection to a fifth Senate term, after spending less than $20 on his campaign, mainly for postage to thank those who circulated his nominating petitions—which, he said in all humility "I didn't ask them to do."

Mr. President, George Aiken was one of the greatest Senators ever to serve in this body. He was a giant of the Green Mountain State, and it is fitting, at the start of the 99th Congress, that we pause to recall his friendship with us, his leadership for the Nation, and his extraordinary stewardship for the people of Vermont.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, last fall, while the Senate was out of session, we lost one of our most distinguished and best loved former Members, Senator George Aiken of Vermont.

Senator Aiken's career in public life was as long as it was remarkable. From a single term in the Vermont General Assembly as the representative of his native Putney, he went on to serve two terms as Vermont's Governor before coming to the U.S. Senate in 1941.

Throughout his Senate tenure, Governor Aiken—although he served 34 years in the Senate and but 4 in the State House, he preferred to be known as Governor—epitomized for us in Washington the Vermonters qualities of frugality, independence, common sense, and modesty.

George Aiken was a Vermont Republican, and nearly as proud of his party affiliation as of his State. Governor Aiken, however, was neither a partisan nor an ideologue. As Governor during the Great Depression, George Aiken embraced the New Deal and worked for the enactment of New Deal style State laws to benefit Vermont's hard pressed rural population. In Washington, George Aiken became a particular favorite of President Roosevelt, who often sought his counsel. Subsequent Democratic and Republican Presidents also sought his counsel, and I think it fair to say, often regretted those occasions they did not follow it.

George Aiken served on the Foreign Relations Committee, eventually becoming its ranking minority member, the position I now hold. He brought to the committee a strong—and often much needed—dose of commonsense. George Aiken's finest contribution was, I believe, his close scrutiny, along with Chairman Fulbright, of our policy in Vietnam.

Senator Aiken is perhaps best remembered for his 1967 advice to President Johnson on how to handle the Vietnam war. George Aiken's prescription "Declare We Won and Get Out" was ultimately accepted by President Nixon but only after the loss of tens of thousands more American lives. Both the country and President Johnson must have regretted not accepting Senator Aiken's advice sooner.

After leaving the Senate George Aiken returned, with his wife Lola, to his Putney hilltop home. There he tended his apple orchards, his raspberries, and the blueberries which grew around his house. Governor Aiken died in his native Vermont, and with him passed a Vermont institution. Both his own State and the U.S. Senate was enriched immensely by his one-of-a-kind presence.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, Senators may have noticed that the lead editorial in the Washington Post last Sunday was about the end of the family farm in America. If George Aiken were here, he would not have liked that idea. What is more, he would have said so. There were two things that everyone—even those of us who had the privilege of serving with him in the Senate for only a few years—knew about George Aiken: that he was, first and foremost, a Vermont farmer, and that he did not hesitate to speak his mind.

His last statement in this RECORD he described as a confession. He said that he had, as a legislator, committed many sins, among them the support of what he called "unnecessary and costly" measures. George Aiken was a frugal man; Vermont farmers have to work too hard for their money to waste it. We could use more of them.

But when we look at his legislative record during his 34 years as a Senator, it is hard to see any faults. He worked for agriculture, rural electification, food stamps, civil rights, a responsible bipartisan foreign policy. All Americans, not just his fellow Vermonters, have reason to be grateful to him for his commitment to hard work, simple values and plain speaking.

There are men who simultaneously leave public life and the public eye. Twelve years after George Aiken left his body, his memory remains as green as the mountains of his native State. We remember him for his personal integrity, his impatience with a lack of candor or generosity, his unerring sense of what was fitting behavior for the country he loved. He gave his friendship and advice widely, and the United States and its leaders were the better for it.

Before he was a U.S. Senator, George Aiken grew wild flowers commercially at the nurseries he founded. He himself believed that the St. Lawrence Seaway was his most significant accomplishment. The residents of New England who are growing his wildflowers and eating his raspberries may be forgiven if they have a different opinion.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, if a latter-day plutarch were to collect biographies of outstanding Americans—to serve as models for future generations—the collection would have to include the story of George D. Aiken. Anyone familiar with the late Senator Aiken's life can easily see why the telling of it might inspire people to mighty and noble achievement, as the tales of the lives of Solon, Demonsthenes, Romulus, Cicero, and other great leaders of Greece and Rome, were meant to inspire us.

A 34 year tenure in the Senate, certainly, is something to which many current members of this body might aspire—though I doubt any would confess it. In 34-years, a Senator could gain positions of great power simply by weight of seniority. But Senator Aiken perceived things differently from those who think up the common wisdom. Although he was the dean of the Senate, he never held the great leadership positions one of his seniority might choose. He persuaded his colleagues in the Senate by means other than swapping favors and votes. He voted his conscience, after serious consideration of the issues; he expected other Senators to do the same. And the evidence shows that very often he was successful in persuading the Senate and the Congress to his point of view. Senator Aiken was a powerful force behind the Food and Peace Program, the land and water conservation fund, wilderness protection, the development of peaceful uses of nuclear power, and the development of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

It is a rare person who can choose the less trod path with little care for what others may think; it is a priceless individual who can take that path and convince others to follow.

Senator Aiken was a partisan in the Senate. He was a Republican, and everybody knew it. He supported his party, at least so long as his party's interests were the same as those of the people of Vermont whom he represented. But while partisan politics in the Congress can try the patience of Members until tempers flare and enemies are made, George Aiken seemed to avoid all that bother.

His best friend in the Senate, his daily breakfast partner, was the leader of the other party, Senator Mike Mansfield of Montana. The story is that those two, over their morning coffee, often devised solutions to the problems that vexed the Senate. Former Senator J. William Fulbright, the Arkansas Democrat who chaired the Foreign Relations Committee while Senator Aiken was the ranking Republican, told a Vermont newspaper that Aiken "was very partisan, but at the same time wise and perceptive—an extremely able man."

Of course, every Senator makes some friends in the other party during his or her career. But again, Senator Aiken's extraordinary ability to make friends extended far outside these Chambers. He even made friends where the political professionals say it cannot be done: in the opposition party in his home State. In 1968, the Democrats in Vermont gave Republican Aiken their party's nomination for the Senate; that left him with no opposition in the final election. What is really remarkable is that the Democrats gave him the nomination on write-in ballots. It is a truly great compliment to his ability congeniality that his State's opposing party would voluntarily select him to bear their standard, too.

Just a few weeks ago, one of Washington's local papers carried an opinion piece suggesting that all of us now in Congress should call this our last term and resign at the end of this Congress, doing this in order to purge the legislative branch of the professional Congressman. Others may share this opinion of Congress, that we are too many lawyers and policymakers, that we are too long in service. But I would propose as a solution, rather than mass resignations, the mass election of more George Aikens. He was not a lawyer, or a professional political staffer. He was a horticulturist and nurseryman. These interests, some say, dominated him all his life, and all of his public life. Two of his three published books are about plants: Pioneering with wildflowers, and pioneering with fruits and berries.

He was also a life-long public servant from his first election to the local school board in 1920—a post in which he served for 17 years. He spent 4 years in the Vermont House of Representatives, and was Speaker of the House from 1933 to 1935.

He won election as Lieutenant Governor in 1935, and was elected Governor in 1937. He came to the U.S. Senate in 1941. In his 34 years of Senate service, he maintained his reputation among lobbyists and Members of Congress as a man who could not be bought, and a man who would not take a stand for something in which he did not believe—reputations which were well-known to his constituents, according to Vermont newspapers.

George Aiken chose to retire from the Senate in 1974, when he was 82. The journal accounts say he would have easily won reelection had he wanted it. His election campaign the previous time—with the nominations of both the Republicans and Democrats—had cost him only $17.09, a sum he would have had no difficulty raising for a similarly easy race. But instead, he went home to Vermont.

A partisan fruit farmer from Putney, VT, who won the friendship and respect of Vermont citizens and world leaders, and held one of the longest tenures of any U.S. Senator, George David Aiken was a man our children would do well to emulate—he was a Senator in whose footsteps we Members of the Senate would be well to follow, too, for the good of our States, the Nation, and the American people. Our loss is not so much in his leaving the Senate, though the Senate sorely misses him, nor is our loss so much in his death, for though we grieve with his family we rejoice that he, certainly, has attained a better world. Our loss is that there are so few like him in any nation, in any age. The Senate, the Congress, the Government, the country—all these things are better for the mark Senator Aiken left upon them. It would be good if present and future Senators and citizens could study his life and follow his example.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in this tribute to the late Senator George Aiken of Vermont. I was not privileged to serve in the Senate with this man once called "the saint of the Senate." But as a Senator from Montana, I feel a special bond with George Aiken because he was Senator Mike Mansfield's closest friend in the Senate.

George Aiken, Republican from Vermont, and Mike Mansfield, Democrat from Montana, had breakfast together nearly every workday morning before 7 a.m. Even when they disagreed on major policy issues and even when Mansfield, as Senate Majority Leader, was involved in partisan political battles, their friendship and mutual respect remained strong. Indeed, in the heat of Congressional disagreement and anguish over the American role in Vietnam, Majority Leader Mansfield referred to Senator Aiken as "an owl": "the wise man, the man who looks ahead, the man who is unswerving in his support of the United States but who is also aware of the dangers which confront us in any given situation* * *."

We remember Senator Aiken as the man with a conscience. But he apparently was also the man with a personal touch, with a sense of humor. On June 25, 1970—the day Mike Mansfield broke the record for length of service as majority leader—Senator Aiken tossed a "needle across the aisle" at his Democratic friend. Senator Aiken's poem went as follows:

Mr. Aiken. Mr. President—

There was a time ten years ago,
If Republican Senators wanted a show,
They would toss a needle across the aisle
And then they'd all sit back and smile.
The Democrats' leader was Lyndon then,
Who was mighty with sword, and sometimes pen.
He was quick to respond to the needle's touch
And never refused a challenge as such.
The show would go on—the air get torrid—
Though Lyndon never said anything horrid.
But Barnum and Bailey could take a rest
When Lyndon was functioning at his best.
And whene'er we'd tense up with talk of taxation,
We could look to Lyndon for relaxation.
Then disaster struck us and Lyndon went on.
And with his departure went most of our fun,
For the Democrats made a new appointment
Which for Republicans spelled disappointment.
They had chosen a man from the Golden West,
Where every kid knows his country is best,
Where they shoot from the hip, whether right or wrong,
And ride off from their victims singing a song.
Of course Mike Mansfield would be such a leader,
Eating needles and darts like steers at a feeder.
He would give us the uplift Republicans need
And meet every challenge by word and by deed.
Did I say disaster struck us this time?
Just another understatement of mine.
For Mike had been leader only a week
When John J. Williams got up to speak.
For John, who was feeling a real good fettle,
Addressed the new leader somewhat like a nettle
And every Republican, one by one,
Sat back in his seat to enjoy the fun.
But, oh, the agony of what followed.
We might as well have arsenic swallowed.
For Mike got up to give John his reply
With such a reproachful look in his eye
That I thought John Williams would like to die.
And never since then do Republicans smile
When a needle is tossed across the aisle,
For we found that Mike is as square as a die,
With a mind as broad as Montana's sky.
It's now ten years that we've worked with Mike,
And during that time we have learned to like
The fairness and candor with which he acts,

And the way when speaking he deals with facts.
So let us be thankful that we serve with one
Whose honor and fairness are second to none.
And since we would miss him on this Senate floor,
I earnestly wish for him six years more—

As minority leader, of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I hope that we who serve in the Senate today can try to learn from the example set by Senator Aiken. If we are to live up to our awesome responsibilities to our Nation and our individual States, we must work to foster cooperation and understanding among Senators from both parties, from all regions, and with diverse points of view. I treasure the friendships I have made in the Senate during my first term, on both sides of the aisle. I hope we can all find time in our busy schedules to add the personal touch that, I am told, George Aiken never failed to have.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is a pleasure to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the late Senator from Vermont, George Aiken. A farmer by occupation, George Aiken's long political career began in the Vermont legislature, where he became speaker and then Lieutenant Governor. He served as Governor of Vermont from 1936 to 1940 before being elected to the Senate in 1941.

In his 34 years in the Senate, George Aiken had many legislative achievements. He was a friend to rural interests by supporting rural electrification programs, flood control, farm and dairy price supports, and Federal crop insurance. His two greatest legislative triumphs were the St. Lawrence Seaway and the Food Stamp Act of 1965.

In the Senate, George Aiken will best be remembered as a blunt, epigrammatic speaker. He was able to remain above the level of partisan politics. This allowed him to become one of the Foreign Relations Committee's most respected members during his time on the committee. He was a man of thrift, both with words and money. There are not many of us who can say we spent less than $20 on our campaigns, or returned money to the treasury from our office allowance at the end of the year. In his speeches, he wasted few words in getting his message across. Most of all, George Aiken was respected for his decency, honesty, integrity, and independence. He is a man that certainly will be missed, but fondly remembered.

SENATOR GEORGE AIKEN

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise to express my sorrow at the passing of Senator George Aiken of Vermont.

I served only briefly in the Senate with George Aiken—in 1974, when I filled a 1-year appointed term and Senator Aiken was in the last year of his long and very distinguished tenure in this body.

But although I did not know George Aiken well, I admired him greatly.

To me, Senator Aiken embodied the best qualities of a public servant, of his party, and of his region of the country.

He was a true Vermonter—a thoughtful, skeptical, yet compassionate person who was never shy about speaking the truth as he saw it, but more importantly he was a great American in every sense of the word.

In conjunction with former majority leader and now Ambassador Mike Mansfield, George Aiken in the mid-1960's spoke the truth to President Lyndon Johnson about the war in Vietnam. In a prophetic report entitled "Vietnam: The Shadow and the Substance," Senators Aiken and Mansfield predicted that the strategy of gradual escalation of American involvement could not work. Our opponents, they argued, could easily match any American escalation and could sustain their efforts indefinitely.

They were right. And on more than one occasion, President Johnson must have wished that he had paid more attention to George Aiken and Mike Mansfield.

But, Mr. President, the legacy of George Aiken goes far beyond his contributions to our foreign policy.

George Aiken was a great friend of rural America.

Along with the late Senator George Norris, he was the author of most of our rural electrification legislation.

He was the moving force behind construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway—a permanent boon to agriculture and industry in his part of the country and mine.

It was George Aiken who led the fight for Federal assistance in the development of rural water systems.

And Senator George Aiken is the man to whom we owe the Eastern Wilderness Act—legislation that preserves in our densely populated part of the country much of what remains of America's original natural beauty.

Mr. President, George Aiken was one of the truly great Senators—a fine, plain-spoken New Englander whose great integrity indelibly marked everything he did.

I join my colleagues in expressing to Lola, his beloved wife, to the Aiken family, and to the people of Vermont my deepest condolences upon this sad occasion.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, my wife, Mary, and I had the opportunity to meet George and Lola Aiken long before I came to Congress. We first met George when he spoke at the North Dakota Farm Bureau Convention and came to visit our farm for a small get-together. In the sixties and seventies, we both served on the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Conference, where he shared his concise and realistic outlook on the need for cooperation between our nations and our people. My respect for George Aiken and what he symbolized grew over the years. His clarity of thought, coupled with his ability to get to the heart of whatever matter was being discussed, was a rare talent. I was honored to work with him, and it was a privilege to know him as both a colleague and a friend.

A TRIBUTE TO GEORGE DAVID AIKEN

Mr. HOLLINGS. George David Aiken was a true statesman and patriot. For 34 years in the U.S. Senate, he served his State of Vermont and his country with distinction and a record of achievement matched by few. For 34 years, his was a voice of wisdom and pragmatism that helped guide this institution through troubled and difficult times. I know I speak for my colleagues when I say we mourn his passing, and will miss him dearly.

When I came to the Senate in 1966, George had already been here for more than two decades, as one of Vermont's most popular Senators ever. He was one of the Senate's foremost experts on agriculture policy and foreign affairs, but what struck me most about him was his determination to do what was right, regardless of ideology. He was a true pragmatist, in the fine American tradition. He was a Republican, yet he was a prime mover behind the food stamps program to alleviate hunger and Federal aid to education. He was an early and strong supporter of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. And as the outspoken ranking Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, George Aiken was one of the few to take an early and strong stand against the escalation of U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

George also had a keen sense of the need for bipartisanship in the functioning of Government. I don't know how many times I saw him seated with Mike Mansfield in the Senate cafeteria discussing foreign policy over breakfast. And I will never forget George standing with me when few others would on the vote to confirm my fellow South Carolinian Clement Haynsworth to the Supreme Court.

Coming from Vermont, George knew the value and was a staunch defender of rural America as a bulwark of our democratic system. And it was back to Vermont that he went when he retired from the Senate in 1974, still sitting tall in the saddle. He did his country and us all proud. I wish his wife, Lola, well. Words mean little at a time of such loss, but we want her to know that she has many friends among Senators and their spouses, and each of us will do anything we can to lend her help and support.

We'll miss you, Governor, but your memory will live on with us.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD be held open for the remainder of the day for any other Senators who might wish to enter speeches and that they appear in the flow of the euology speeches in honor of Senator Aiken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STAFFORD. On that basis, Mr. President, I yield the floor.

COMMENDATION OF SENATOR STEVENS

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk on behalf of myself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. SIMPSON, and Mr. SYMMS, and ask for its immediate consideration. I might add that it has been cleared by the minority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered. The resolution will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 43

Whereas the end of the Ninety-eighth Congress represented for Senator Ted Stevens the completion of eight years of service as the Assistant Republican Leader, including four years as the assistant minority leader and four years as the assistant majority leader;

Whereas as the assistant Republican leader, Ted Stevens was unrelenting in his devotion to principle, unfailingly performed his duties with courage and dedication, and consistently demonstrated the qualities of a true patriot;

Whereas Ted Stevens eloquently and effectively represented the unique interests of the State of Alaska as its senior Senator while simultaneously fulfilling his leadership role;

Whereas Ted Stevens discharged his responsibilities with adherence to the highest standards of conduct and in the best tradition of the Senate; and

Whereas Ted Stevens earned the confidence, admiration and respect of his fellow Senators: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate thanks Senator Ted Stevens for his service as the Assistant Republican leader and expresses its appreciation for his contributions to the Republican Party and to the United States Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, the resolution that I introduce today commends the distinguished senior Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS] for the work that he has done during the past 8 years as assistant minority leader and as assistant majority leader.

TED STEVENS has been a friend to me since my earliest days in Washington. I have learned much from him, and I have the highest respect for the manner in which he has conducted himself as part of the leadership of the Senate.

His service to his party and to this institution is exceeded only by his commitment to the principles that he holds dear. The past 4 years have not only seen him serve with distinction as assistant majority leader but at the same time represent ably the interests of the State of Alaska. As chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, he has played a critical role in restoring America's strength.

Few Senators could have performed these duties with the degree of confidence and success as TED STEVENS was able to do.

At times, I was on the opposite side of policy disputes with TED STEVENS and I can state to my colleagues that the tenacity he displays during a legislative battle is equaled only by his courage and dedication and above all, fairness.

I am proud to serve in this institution with Senator STEVENS. He is a patriot in every sense of the word and I salute his efforts and his contributions.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President. I am pleased to cosponsor this resolution recognizing my State's senior Senator and most influential leader. TED STEVENS has devoted virtually his entire life to public service, the last 16 of which has been in the U.S. Senate. His first love is Alaska, his second is the institution of the Senate.

Alaskans know that TED STEVENS represents them well in Congress. The 75 percent of the vote he received in his reelection bids attests to the love our people have for this man.

He started his public service on behalf of Alaska back in the late fifties when he was working for Fred Seaton at the Interior Department. TED was one of the principle forces in getting the Alaska statehood bill through Congress.

Soon after he came to the U.S. Senate in 1969 he faced his first Alaska controversy, working to get confirmation of Walter Hickel as Secretary of Interior. After oil was discovered in Alaska that year, TED's next priority became settlement of the Alaska Native claims issue, and then getting a Federal right-of-way permit for the pipeline across Alaska—which took a tie-breaking vote from the Vice President. A few years ago TED was in front of the compromise legislation to resolve the remaining major Alaska lands issues.

Our State has been the subject of a number of significant Federal legislative issues, and we've been fortunate to have Senator TED STEVENS representing us to resolve them successfully.

TED STEVENS' personal energy, his skills in the legislative process, and his commitment to the institution of the Senate are legendary.

For the past 8 years he has served his party well as the assistant Republican leader in the Senate. His accomplishments as Defense Appropriations Subcommittee chairman are also widely recognized.

I'm pleased that the majority leader recently tabbed TED to head the delegation of U.S. Senate observers to the arms control talks. I can't think of a person more able to ensure that our interests as a nation will be protected.

All Alaskans are proud of our Senator TED STEVENS and I'm pleased to cosponsor this tribute to him.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 43) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the RECORD be kept open today for cosponsors and that I might add as original cosponsors Senator DOLE and Senator MURKOWSKI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I earnestly request that I be listed as a cosponsor of the resolution of Senator MATTINGLY.

Senator STEVENS is my predecessor. He has been absolutely unselfish in guiding me and assisting me and giving me counsel, advice—and solace at times—with regard to what is ahead for me as assistant majority leader. I hope this body continues to utilize his rare talent, his intellect, and his skills. I am sure that the disappointment which comes to us all in political endeavors in defeat at any time is and always will be tough. I know that personally.

We need Senator STEVENS. I hope he continues to offer us his skills and his abilities and his knowledge of the rules and procedures. I for one have already gained signficantly from his willingness to share so much with me as I embark upon this task.

I wish to be associated with the remarks of the Senator from Georgia.

Also, I wish to add that Senator STEVENS' wife, Cathy, and little Lily, and all the other members of his family, are a great part of the Senate family.

I thank the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Wyoming is agreed to.

SEA EAGLE EXERCISE

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, the United States has formally requested permission from the New Zealand Government to make a port call by a Navy ship in connection with a planned exercise called Sea Eagle.

According to news reports, the New Zealand Government will not decide whether to grant the request for several weeks. New Zealand's Prime Minister, David Lange, apparently is committed to his Labour Party's policy of prohibiting port calls by ships that are nuclear powered or nuclear armed.

Mr. President, no person, no group, no nation has a moral corner or monopoly on the fear of nuclear war. Every sane and rational person views the potential for the termination of much, if not all, of life on this planet with a horror as absolute as the vision of apocalypse demands.

But to be aware and fearful of nuclear war is not enough. Nor is it sufficient to adopt policies which serve notice of one's fear and outrage if it does little to reduce the risk of nuclear war, but, ironically, enhances the chance of what is abhorred by undermining the ability to deter it.

This is precisely the course of conduct that New Zealand appears to be following. It may be a noble gesture to bar any nuclear-powered or nuclear-armed ship from its harbors, but it is also a naive and dangerous one on at least two counts. First, there is no enclave that is safe from the scourge of nuclear war even if it were to occur thousands of miles from its borders. Dr. Carl Sagan and other scientists have written elaborately and persuasively on the subject of nuclear winter—a phenomenon that would lock the globe in a fist of subzero temperatures and then permit the Sun to mercilessly scorch an Earth no longer protected by atmospheric shields. In short, there is no place to hide from the nuclear monster.

Second, the moral and ostrich-like posture struck by New Zealand is dangerous because it is unilateral and is unlikely to be reciprocated by the Soviet Union and any of its allies. There are no such antinuclear protests in Moscow, Budapest, or East Berlin. Cam Ranh Bay remains open to Soviet warships whatever their propulsion or payload. By denying the United States the ability to make port calls, New Zealanders are, in effect, playing the pipes of appeasement—not those of peace. The Labour Party may be making a high-minded political statement, but in geopolitical stratagems, consequences matter a good deal more than motives.

It is not given to me or any other Member of Congress to lecture the people or leadership of an independent and free nation. But as a Member of the U.S. Senate I have an obligation to point out the potential consequences of ill-considered action so that there will be no misapprehension about the future and fate of ANZUS or subsequent economic policies of the United States.

If New Zealand chooses to take unilateral action to demonstrate its opposition to the existence of nuclear weapons, then it raises the question of whether it is prepared to defend itself unilaterally—not only its national security but its national economy as well.

It is by virtue of the defense of freedom that nations enjoy the benefits of international trade on a scope unparalleled in history.

We in the free world depend upon open access to the global trade routes. Diminish the ability to defend that access and you thereby diminish the ability to enjoy the benefits of the trade itself.

It is my understanding that State Department officials have indicated that this administration would not seek economic sanctions if New Zealand should pursue its exercise in unilateralism.

Perhaps it is a matter of semantics and that our diplomats privately draw a distinction between trade sanctions and an end to trade restraint. But if not, there should be no misunderstanding on the part of New Zealanders that the U.S. Congress would be bound by State Department declarations.

If New Zealand is unwilling to bear the burdens of defending freedom, they should not enjoy the benefits of our effort and that of Australia to defend it for them. Nor should they enjoy the benefits from the restraint we place upon our domestic producers of products that New Zealand places into international markets.

If New Zealand pursues its policy of refusing permission to U.S. or allied ships to make port calls, we should, in my view, seriously consider two things: First, preclude New Zealand from participating in all future exercises with the United States and its allies; Second, end the artificial restraints that we have placed upon American producers so that we can compete in the international marketplace on equal terms.

I would prefer to be more delicate and diplomatic in approaching the national and moral sensibililties of a nation that has thus far been a staunch supporter of the preservation of poliltical and economic freedom. But a fatuous idea, left unhindered by logic or history, has many waiting votaries. Indeed, there are those in other nations who do not yet live under the shadow of the Soviet state who believe that the only choices remaining are between freedom and annihilation, atomization and abdication. Peace and freedom are in fact possible, but not if we unilaterally undermine our ability to defend that freedom.

So in this case, I leave diplomacy for others. I feel a higher duty to forewarn an ally that dangerous and ill-considered action will carry consequences that are foreseeable and should be foreseen.

(Mr. PRESSLER assumed the chair.)

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COHEN. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Maine for a very excellent speech which I think points to a very important aspect of those people around the world who wish to defend freedom. I certainly share his viewpoint on it. I think he is quite corrrect.

I might even go one step further and say that peace and freedom are inseparable, that there really can be no peace without freedom.

Incidentally, my State used to be a big producer of lamb. Now, at most grocery stores in Idaho, you will find that a great deal of lamb—it is not lamb, but mutton—is from New Zealand. The American producers of lamb have gone down in numbers as the sheep population has gone down.

Those people who wish to send in to this market and trade with us are not willing to allow ports of call on the part of the U.S. Navy. I wonder what they are going to do when the Soviet Navy steams into New Zealand waters. Do they think the Soviet Navy will respect in any way a nuclear-free zone? I think the record shows clearly that they will not.

The Senator from Maine is correct in his analysis of this matter. I think it is most important.

Earlier this year, we had planned a trip by a delegation from the Senate, in which I was to take part, which was to be led by the distinguished Senator from Alaska. It was canceled because of logistics, among other reasons. The purpose was to take a message to New Zealand as to how critical this is and how those of us in the U.S. Senate view their unwillingness to cooperate with the nations in the hemisphere with which we have been allied for 40-plus years.

I hope that Senators who are not in the Chamber will read the remarks of the Senator from Maine, because I think he is right on target. I mentioned to him in private conversation earlier that one of the things I read regularly in the office is the Harry Shultz Newsletter. About 4 or 5 months ago, Mr. Schultz had some very interesting things to say about this matter. I will dig those out and submit them for the RECORD in another day or two, because he predicted what was going to happen.

I hope our friends will pay attention, and I hope the people of New Zealand will read what the Senator from Maine has said.

Mr. COHEN. I thank the Senator.

I hasten to point out that the Government of New Zealand has not yet made the decision to bar U.S. ships from their harbors. But there is an opportunity for them to consider the circumstances as to what action might result in this body and in the other body from such a dangerous decision.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

THE MYTHS ABOUT ARMS CONTROL

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President on January 13, Robert G. Kaiser wrote a superb article in the Washington Post entitled "The Myths Clouding the Arms Debate." If every Member of the Senate and House would read this article and think about it, and verify the facts on which Mr. Kaiser's logical conclusions are based, this could be the most constructive Congress in a long time. Consider the myths that Kaiser dispels.

First: The alleged Soviet military buildup. The administration has justified the immense U.S. military buildup and the absence to date of a successful arms control policy on the assumption that the Soviets are still engaged in a huge military buildup, particularly in military procurement.

If there has been one steady and consistent drumbeat from the administration, it has been that the Russians are continuing to zip by us in their conventional and nuclear arms buildup, and that we must rush to catch up. This is the heart of Weinberger's argument for a continued hike in military expenditures in this big year of a mammoth budget deficit. This is also the prime basis for stalling and hedging arms control policy. The administration argues for a faster U.S. buildup so we do not freeze ourselves into a position of permanent inferiority to the Soviets. And this is the basis for Secretary Shultz' appeal to the Congress to proceed with the MX deployment and the star wars research so we can negotiate from a position of parity with the big Soviet miliatary buildup.

As Kaiser points out:

> Reagan and Weinberger have demonstrated once again that any allegation of this kind (that the Soviets are building up their military in a rush) repeated often enough from authoritative quarters, becomes an accepted fact.

Well, now we find that this just is not true. Richard Kaufman, the general counsel of the Joint Economic Committee, has taken the declassified testimony of the CIA before our committee and explained in detail that the buildup of Soviet military power in the 1960's and 1970's, slowed after 1976 and the alleged increase in procurement virtually stopped since then. Until about 1976 overall Soviet military spending grew at about a 5-percent rate. Then it slowed down to about a 2-percent level and Soviet military procurement appears not to have grown at all in the late 1970's. These figures apply for the period 1977 to 1981. The CIA has not yet sanitized the figures since 1981 but we expect to have them available soon, I believe in the next week or two. As Kaiser contends:

> During a decade that President Reagan has described as a period of relentless Soviet buildup, the Russians actually cut the growth of their defense spending in half.

And they virtually brought their increase in military procurement spending to a halt. That is myth No. 1 put to rest.

Second, Kaiser exposes the myth that the strategic defense initiative (SDI) or Star Wars can render nuclear weapons obsolete. As Kaiser points out, SDI is a pipe dream. In Kaiser's words: "No responsible scientist could suggest that such a goal is feasible." How does an adversary overcome "Star Wars"? Simple. They overcome it by simply building more offensive missiles, or by using decoys, or by hardening the skin of the offensive missiles, or by using cruise missiles which everyone agrees SDI could not stop, or by using bombers or by using submarines. And they agree that SDI will not work with respect to those weapons.

Now the top experts in the administration all but concede that Star Wars cannot save our American cities, but they argue that it could protect our land-based deterrent, or at least some of it. How about that? Even for this so-called point defense it will not work against any kind of a diversified offense. And even if it did protect our land-based missiles perfectly, that constitutes less than a quarter of our deterrent—because, of course, we have submarines, where we have 50 percent of our deterrent; we have bombers, where we have 25 percent of our deterrent—it is unnecessary to protect our much larger, more potent, and far less vulnerable submarine and bomber deterrent because they cannot be reached. In any event it is obvious that this fabulously expensive technology—which is estimated to cost $1 trillion—is in no sense a substitute for deterrence or arms control. That is the second myth.

Third, the Soviets are alleged to be indifferent to deterrence, to be unimpressed by mutually assured destruction. This is wrong. As Kaiser demonstrates, the Russians have been emphatic and consistent in expressing the conviction that a further buildup of nuclear weapons is senseless and that a retaliatory strike by a defender using the weapons left after the most devastating, conceivable preemptive first strike would totally devastate the attacker. The Russians are not insane. They have said all this themselves. It is a fact. And they know it is a fact. That is myth No. 3.

The fourth myth coming from the administration is that past arms control treaties have been failures—that the Russians have pushed right up to the limits of SALT I and II and beyond. As Kaiser notes—again—this is a "truth" that is just plain wrong.

As John Steinbrunner of Brookings has pointed out, SALT II would allow th Soviets to have nearly twice as many warheads on their missiles as they actually had as of mid-1984. Furthermore, the arms control treaties have stopped the nuclear arms testing in the atmosphere that could have polluted our planet with radioactive fallout. The limit on offensive missiles on both sides are high in SALT I and SALT II but they limit a breakout to an uncontrolled wild arms race. Finally, the Kaiser article reinforces the view that we can prudently proceed with arms control, provided we insist on the mutuality of agreements and effective verification. Kaiser's argument also reinforces the contention of many of us that we can hold our own military spending down to a reasonable level without any real risk that in doing so we are undermining the national security.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Robert G. Kaiser in the January 13, 1984, issue of the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MYTHS CLOUDING THE ARMS DEBATE

(By Robert G. Kaiser)

The Shultz-Gromyko talks in Geneva were a revealing extravaganza. The hoopla, the ridiculous media overkill (nearly 500 accredited American journalists!), the enormous ado about a procedural diplomatic event that did nothing but get us back to the same negotiating table with the Russians—all this was a sign, if another were needed, that we've lost touch with the basic realities of nuclear arms and arms control.

Why did we get so lathered up about the Geneva meetings? Perhaps because they spoke to some primal anxiety about nuclear weapons. But also because of the delusion that somehow, after five years of inaction in arms control, one meeting was going to make a profound difference in the Soviet-American relationship.

It is conventional wisdom in Washington these days that if he really wants one, Ronald Reagan is bound to be able to get an arms control agreement in the next couple of years. But this conventional wisdom is not shared by many of the people who worked on SALT I and II—people who know what really goes into negotiating one of these deals.

The SALT I treaty required three years of intense negotiations involving the senior officials of both governments. The SALT II treaty took six years to complete—the weaponry and the politics were both getting more complex. But no real progress has been made on the next arms control agreement, and the issues have gotten still more complicated.

In fact, the Reagan administration has no conceptual idea of what kind of deal it wants, or how it might persuade the Russians to move in the same direction; it earnestly seeks to protect all American advantages and new programs, while forcing the Soviets to abandon many of theirs. This is not a formula for success.

The idea that this administration is now on the road to a new agreement with the Russians is one of the myths that clouds discussion of these matters. It's tempting to argue that the myths outnumber and outweigh the facts. Consider a few of them:

The Soviet buildup. The president and his secretary of defense have been telling us emphatically for four years about the relentless Soviet arms buildup. Several years ago they were saying it had actually given the Russians a clear strategic advantage.

Reagan and Weinberger have demonstrated once again that any allegation of this kind, repeated often enough from authoritative quarters, becomes an accepted fact. Who now doubts that the Soviet Union has indeed engaged in a relentless buildup, one that has intensified since the SALT I and II treaties were signed?

Well, anyone who reads the inaugural issue of a new academic journal called Soviet Economics will have to doubt that wisdom. Using already-released (but little discussed) CIA estimates, Richard E. Kaufman of Congress's Joint Economic Committee explains in a detailed article in the journal that the very real Soviet buildup of the '60s and '70s actually slowed down significantly after 1976.

From 1977 to 1981, according to the CIA, Soviet procurement of new weapons measured in dollars (that is, calculated to show their cost if the U.S. had acquired the same weapons) did not grow at all. This pattern probably continued in 1982; more recent figures are not yet available.

The CIA's numbers show that Soviet spending on armaments slowed down markedly in the mid-'70s. For the previous decade it had grown at constant rates of nearly 5 percent a year; in the last decade the growth has been 2 percent a year (much less than the growth of American spending).

In other words, during a decade that President Reagan has described as a period of relentless Soviet buildup, the Russians actually cut the growth of their "defense spending" by more than half! How can we conduct a serious discussion of these issues when the facts and the rhetoric are as discordant as that?

The Strategic Defense Initiative, or "Star Wars." Any concerned citizen reading the papers knows that the Russians are alarmed by the American "Star Wars" program, intended, in one of President Reagan's memorable phrases, as "a means of rendering these nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete."

Reagan introduced this idea in March 1983, and since then it has taken on a life of its own—become so real that a reporter could ask the president at his news conference last week if he would "consider setting limits on the deployment and the testing of 'Star Wars?' ".

In fact, there is no "Star Wars" system to test or deploy. The idea remains a dream. In its extreme form, as a scheme to render nukes "impotent and obsolete," it is a pipe dream. No responsible scientist could suggest that such a goal is feasible with any known technology.

Someone on the president's staff seems to have gotten through to him with this reality. The White House released a pamphlet designed to promote the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) earlier this month; in a forword signed by Reagan, the SDI was redescribed as a means of "rendering ballistic missiles [not all "nuclear weapons," as he said in '83] impotent and obsolete." Even if that were possible (and in the forseeable future it isn't), bombs could still be delivered by airplanes, unpiloted drones called cruise missiles—or by terrorists carrying them in suitcases. Is any Congress going to appropriate the hundreds of billions—some experts say at least a trillion dollars—that a Star Wars program would cost if it only holds out the problematic hope of disarming some Soviet missiles, but not protecting against nuclear bombs delivered by other means?

The "Star Wars" myth has a cynical aspect that deserves more attention than it has received. The president's grandiose idea has undeniable popular appeal; who wouldn't like to think we can find a foolproof defense against nukes? "All through history we've been able to come up with a defensive weapon," the president likes to say—why not with these weapons, as with all others? (But wait: what "weapon" did we invent to defend against the bullet? Against germ warfare? No, Reagan is wrong about that, too.)

The appeal comes from the thought that defense is possible—that we might avoid nuclear holocaust through technological ingenuity. This, the president says, would allow us to escape today's "immoral" reliance on deterrence—the threat of a devastating retaliatory attack if the Soviets attacked us—as our only defense against nuclear war.

But Reagan administration officials responsible for Star Wars recognize—and have publicly acknowledged—that until unforseeable technical breakthroughs are achieved, all we can hope for is a defensive system that might offer protection for some of our own land-based intercontinental ballistic missiles. These officials, including George Keyworth, Reagan's science advisor, say we could build a defense that would knock a lot of Soviet missiles out of the sky before they could destroy our missiles in their silos.

What would be the good of this? Why, it would "enhance deterrence"—that is, it would increase the possibility that even if the Russians attacked us with a huge first strike, some of our missiles would survive, and would be able to attack the Soviet Union, destroying it as a functioning modern society. What happened to Reagan's noble idea of evading the immorality of deterrence? Up in smoke. In the name of going beyond deterrence, Star Wars becomes a program to reinforce it—at enormous cost, and in a way that would inevitably compel the Soviets to build more offensive weapons. (How else could they counter a new American system that could destroy a portion of Soviet rockets in flight? They would build more rockets, and more decoys too.)

Soviet indifference to nuclear dangers. How many times have you heard that the Russians just don't believe in the doctrine of deterrence, or "mutual assured destruction"? This is now a commonplace among many experts and commentators: the United States, it is said, might accept the idea that launching an attack is crazy, because we'd be destroyed by the Soviet retaliation; but the Russians somehow don't agree, and believe they could survive and win a nuclear war.

The traditional American view of deterrence is based on thoughts like these: "With the quantity and diversity of nuclear missiles that already exists, it is impossible to destroy the enemy's systems with a single strike. A crushing retaliatory strike against the aggressor, even by the limited quantity of nuclear weapons remaining to the defender—a strike inflicting unacceptable damage—is inevitable in present conditions." Many believers in the effectiveness of deterrence would agree that "you don't have to be a military man or a scientist to realize that a further buildup [of nuclear weapons] is becoming senseless." To hear the hard-line commentators tell it, though, the Russians won't buy those notions.

Those two quotations, however, come from Marshal Nikolai Ogarkov, until September the chief of the Soviet general staff. He made those remarks in an interview with Red Star, the newspaper of the Soviet Defense Ministry—the medium through which Soviet military men learn the party line.

The failure of past arms control agreements. If you read or watched the outpouring of media pronouncements last week, you were told repeatedly that SALT I and II and other arms control agreements failed to slow the arms race—that it went on virtually unabated despite those pieces of paper.

This is another of those oft-repeated truths that is wrong. Thanks to past agreements, no nuclear weapons are tested in the atmosphere. Neither country can try to deploy an effective defensive system, so neither can seriously dream of launching an attack that would result in anything but its own destruction. Both sides are required to limit their arsenals to fixed numbers of offensive missiles and warheads. (These limits are high, but they do prevent a wild new arms race; if such limits are not in force, no Star Wars system is likely to be effective even against Soviet rockets, because the Soviets will build too many.) Thanks to SALT II, both sides have agreed on "counting rules" that would enable them to verify new agreements substantially reducing the number of deployed weapons; without such rules, future agreements will be impossible.

This is only a partial list of the many benefits of earlier arms control. The Reagan administration confirms that these benefits are real by continuing to adhere to all past agreements, even the SALT II treaty that it publicly deplores.

It's also said that the Soviets routinely exploit every arms control agreement to the hilt, pushing each provision to its limit if not beyond. But as John Steinbruner of the Brookings Institution has pointed out, SALT II would allow the Soviets to have nearly twice as many warheads on their missiles as they actually had as of mid-1984; they're far below the permitted maximum.

At the same time, in his first term President Reagan demonstrated convincingly how the arms race can be reinvigorated without arms control. He has opened the door to new and expensive competitions in anti-satellite weapons, weapons in space, cruise missiles and more.

Future historians, if there are any, will probably look back at these first four decades of the nuclear era as a time of self-delusion and struggle—struggle to come to terms with the facts of thermonuclear life.

So far the struggle has gotten the best of us. Aware from Hiroshima onward that we were dealing with a new kind of monster, we have tried to tame it, to master it. These efforts have led us to a world of 50,000 warheads and delivery systems of a sophistication that was unimaginable 40 years ago. In many practical ways we see that military men and politicians realize that these weapons are unusable, yet we keep building more of them. In sum, we have confirmed the genius of Albert Einstein's insight that "the unleashed power of the atom has changed everything except our way of thinking."

WHATEVER HAPPENED TO COMPETENCE IN APPOINTING TOP PUBLIC OFFICIALS?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in hiring people for positions of immense authority to determine the taxes we pay, the search for peace in this dangerous nuclear world, the just execution of our laws and the energy that provides the force and strength of our economy, how important is relevant experience? Is it of any significance at all?

Should the next Secretary of the Treasury—the man who has more direct power over the taxes we pay and the course of the economy than any other appointed official—should he have had some experience and training in tax policy and economics? Of course. Well, the President is appointing a man who has many fine qualifications to serve in many capacities in our Government but what training or experience has he had to serve as Secretary of the Treasury? Answer: None. No training, not one day's experience.

All of us are aware of the absolutely critical importance of our coming arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union. These negotiations can make the difference between a world that moves toward peace and reliance on arms control agreements and a world that relies on winning the nuclear arms race. Who is the President appointing as our chief negotiator? He is appointing a man I have known for more than 30 years. He has been very helpful to this Senator from the very first day I came to Washington as a new Senator. I admire him. I respect him. He is not only bright, he is wise. He is a skilled and experienced negotiator. He is a very good man, indeed. But what does he know about arms control? Indeed, what experience has he ever had to learn anything about arms control? Answers: nothing and none.

The New York Times reported on Saturday, January 19:

> Mr. Kampelman acknowledged that he had virtually no experience in arms control, and that there were many others in Washington better qualified.

If there is any top, policymaking, appointed office that more than any other requires dedication to the unique distinction of America as a country that honors human freedom above all and requires solid experience as a lawyer in fighting for freedom, it is the Office of Attorney General, the Nation's No. 1 lawyer. And who is the President appointing as Attorney General? A man who has such a grotesque misunderstanding of meaning of freedom that he has called the American Civil Liberties Union "a lobby for criminals." Is he a distinguished and successful lawyer? The President's appointee to be the Nation's No. 1 lawyer has achieved absolutely no recognition, none, as a lawyer. In the American Bar Association's listing of the thousands of lawyers who are well qualified, his name is conspicuously absent. If a person with this experience should be recommended to head any of the thousands of law firms in this country, with this kind of record the partners in the firm would think you were kidding. But the President is appointing this wholly unqualified man to be the Attorney General of the United States—the head of the biggest law office on Earth with supervision over more than 60,000 employees. He will be the country's No. 1 lawyer. He, more than any other man, will be charged with the responsibility of championing the quality we cherish above all others as Americans: freedom including freedom to dissent. In his condemnation of the American Civil Liberties Union, he has shown he does not understand freedom.

Finally, the President is appointing a person as head of the Department of Energy who has absolutely no experience in the field at all, none. If you should put on a blindfold, open the telephone book to any random page and let your finger fall on the first name that occurs and then recommend that person as Secretary of Energy, you would have at least as good a chance as this Presidential nominee to be qualified to serve as head of this Department. The President has appointed a man who does not even pretend to have any qualifications.

Mr. President, think of it, here are four top jobs—positions of great power, each of which will have a profound influence on the life and well being of all Americans: Secretary of the Treasury, our chief arms control negotiator, the Attorney General of the United States, and Secretary of Energy. At least two of them are extraordinarily fine human beings, intelligent, resourceful, skilled, but none of them, not one, is qualified for the job to which he is being appointed.

In ancient Rome one of the worst of a very bad run emperors was Caligula. He has come down through history as a personification of the corruption and venality that finally brought Rome to its knees. Perhaps his most damning act, even if it did have more than a touch of humor, was his appointment of his horse as Roman Consul. I am talking about the giddap horse that he rode. Caligula's act, of course, not only showed a sick sense of humor but a gross contempt for the Roman Senate. These Reagan appointments show a gross contempt for our country.

Of course, Mr. Baker will be overwhelmingly approved as Secretary of the Treasury, perhaps unanimously. This Senator is torn on this nomination. Baker clearly has no qualifications to be Secretary of the Treasury. But he has an established track record as Chief of Staff in the White House. He has skillfully handled tax matters for the President in negotiations with Members of the Congress. He is a quick study. He obviously will have great influence with both the President and the Congress. He also has handled the press with extraordinary success. Even though he may not know what he is doing in dealing with complex economic and tax matters, he will probably accomplish the President's aims. That may be bad for the country. But the President has won two landslide victories so that kind of performance will have to be considered good democracy.

Max Kampelman, of course, will not be subject to Senate confirmation. Like Baker he will work this administration's will in arms control. That may not be in the interest of peace. But then Ronald Reagan won the election and won it big.

As for Ed Meese, the answer from this Senator has to be a loud and firm "no." Ronald Reagan won the election. Ed Meese will carry out the Reagan policies and convictions, but here is one Senator who does not believe that this wholly unqualified nominee who has shown such a gross failure to understand the essence of the freedom for which this country stands should serve for 1 minute as Attorney General of the United States.

Finally, Mr. Herrington has not demonstrated the ability even to carry out the energy policies of this administration wrong as they are. This is an easy no vote.

COMMON CAUSE STUDY SHOWS MEESE UNFIT TO BE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, Common Cause, that uncommon organization which functions so effectively on behalf of the public good, has performed another vital service. In its review of the report of the independent counsel investigating allegations that Edwin Meese had committed Federal crimes, Common Cause has presented a compelling case against Senate confirmation of Mr. Meese to be Attorney General.

As my colleagues know, the independent counsel's report determined that there was no basis for indicting Mr. Meese on criminal charges. This conclusion evoked an immediate response from President Reagan in praise of the report's vindication of his nominee to be Attorney General.

But the Common Cause study of the independent counsel's report makes it abundantly clear that Edwin Meese, while perhaps free of any criminal wrongdoing, is totally unfit to serve as Attorney General. In its conclusion, the Common Cause review states:

In the end the question is very simple. The Independent Counsel did not charge Mr. Meese with a crime. Mr. Meese may have intended no wrong. His past conduct shows, however, that he is blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official. He should not be confirmed as Attorney General.

Mr. President, I shall have more to say at a later date about the Meese nomination. But for now, I urge my colleagues to examine carefully the superb study by Common Cause to which I have been referring, and I ask unanimous consent that a copy be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CASE AGAINST EDWIN MEESE III FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL

(A Review of the Independent Counsel's Report Prepared by Common Cause)

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This Review was prepared by Michal Freedman, Associate Director of the Issue Development staff of Common Cause, working with Archibald Cox, Jean Cobb, Elise Garcia, Florence Graves, Stephen Hitchner, Julie Kosterlitz, Janet Leno, Ann McBride, Ginny Sassaman, Steve Seitz, Fred Wertheimer, and Roger Witten.

In January 1984 Edwin Meese III was nominated to be Attorney General of the United States. In March, as a consequence of information revealed in the press and during the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on the Meese nomination, Attorney General William French Smith initiated a preliminary investigation of possible criminal charges against Mr. Meese. Such an investigation is required before asking for the appointment of an Independent Counsel under the Ethics in Government Act. Concerned that the inquiry might be too narrow, Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond (SC) and Joseph Biden, Jr. (DE), ranking minority member of the Committee, asked Attorney General Smith to conduct a comprehensive investigation of Mr. Meese. The next day, Mr. Meese asked for the appointment of an Independent Counsel. Several days later, after Mr. Smith, in accordance with the Act, had requested that a panel of judges from the United States Court of Appeals appoint an Independent Counsel, the court selected Jacob Stein, Esq., a well-known lawyer in private practice, "to investigate any allegation or evidence of violation of any criminal law by Mr. Meese."

Mr. Stein investigated 11 charges against Mr. Meese. They included allegations that Mr. Meese had accepted financial favors in connection with helping individuals to obtain federal jobs, that he had willfully filed false financial disclosure statements, and that he had improperly obtained a promotion in the U.S. Army Reserve.

In late September 1984, the Independent Counsel's Report was released. The Report concluded that there was "no basis" for indicting Mr. Meese on criminal charges. President Reagan immediately hailed the report as a "vindication" of his counsellor. Mr. Meese said he was "very happy" with the Report. Mr. Meese's lawyers, E. Robert Wallach and Leonard Garment, declared that the Report's "exhaustive" inquiry should end "suspicions" and that it would be "grossly unfair" to deny Mr. Meese "the benefit of the favorable outcome." The White House response and the accompanying publicity created the impression that Mr. Meese had been cleared of all wrongdoing and that no legitimate hurdle remained to prevent his confirmation as Attorney General of the United States.

The Independent Counsel's Report [1] does not constitute a "vindication" of Mr. Meese against charges of repeated ethical violations. It does not demonstrate his fitness to serve as Attorney General. Despite the request of Mr. Meese's counsel, Mr. Stein explicitly refused to say ". . . that the evidence does not substantiate the loose charges of moral turpitude against Mr. Meese." He also explicitly refused to make an "evaluation of Mr. Meese's fitness for public office." (3) He explained that neither of these questions was within his jurisdiction.

These are not merely technical distinctions. There is a marked difference between indictable crimes and violations of the ethical standards long applicable to public officials. A finding that there is no basis for prosecuting Mr. Meese for criminal misconduct is not enough to demonstrate that he has the ethical sensitivity and judgment required of an Attorney General.

The evidence summarized by the Independent Counsel, far from vindicating Mr. Meese, clearly shows that he repeatedly acted in violation of the ethical standards that should have governed his conduct, and that he is therefor unfit to be Attorney General.

I. THE ETHICAL STANDARDS REQUIRED OF AN ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

Choosing an Attorney General of the United States is one of the most important appointments to be made by a President and confirmed by the Senate. The Attorney General is the chief legal officer of the nation, its highest law enforcement official, and, aside from the Supreme Court Justice and the President, the government official with the greatest responsibility for upholding the Constitution and federal laws. It is the Attorney General who is responsible for advising the President and the heads of all other executive departments on matters of law. It is the Attorney General who bears responsibility for ensuring that the law is applied evenly, impartially, and without regard for the position, power, or party of any of the individuals involved. And it is the Attorney General who has a greater opportunity than anyone other than the President to set the ethical tone of an Administration by both his personal conduct and his advice.

Archibald Cox, Chairman of Common Cause, formerly Solicitor General of the United States, and the first Watergate Special Prosecutor, stresses this point: "The Attorney General must symbolize the highest standards of honor, integrity and freedom from self-interest in the performance of public office. He, more than any other individual, must give the American people confidence that he regards—and is requiring other officials to regard—public office as a public trust." No one can effectively serve those functions who, even though not guilty of a crime, has left the appearance of repeatedly mixing government appointments with his private financial affairs.

An executive order and federal regulations applicable to all government employees—not merely the nation's highest officials—require that public office should not be used, or appear to be used, to serve private ends. Executive Order 11222, "Prescribing Standards of Ethical Conduct for Government Officers and Employees," which has been in effect since 1965, prohibits actions—

". . . which might result in, or create the appearance of . . . using public office for private gain; . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person; . . . losing complete independence or impartiality of action; . . . or . . . affecting adversely the confidence of the public in the integrity of the Government." [Emphasis added.]

Moreover, White House officials are expressly instructed, by regulation, to "conduct themselves so as to exemplify the highest standards of integrity . . . [and] avoid any action . . . which might result in, or create the appearance of . . . [l]osing complete independence or impartiality . . . " 3 C.F.R. § 100.735-4. [Emphasis added.] Federal regulations go on to state that—

"It is equally important that each employee [of the Executive Office of the President] avoid becoming involved in situations which present the possibility, or even the appearance, that his official position might be used to his private advantage." 3 C.F.R. § 100.735-8." [Emphasis added.]

The reasons for the uniform prohibition against a public official's acceptance of financial favors creating the appearance or a loss of impartiality are plain:

First, even the most scrupulous of individuals who receives financial favors while in public office cannot be sure, even subjectively, that his later official action favoring the donor will not be influenced by gratitude—if not by the hope of future gain. To the extent that his judgment is so influenced, the public will be cheated.

Second, the sight of a government official approving for office or otherwise dealing on behalf of the government with individuals who have done him financial favors undermines public confidence in the honesty and evenhandedness with which government business is conducted. In the words of Executive Order 11222 it "create[s] the appearance of . . . losing complete independence or impartiality of action."

Third, the sight of a government official approving for office or otherwise dealing on behalf of government with individuals who have done him financial favors sets a destructive example inviting other government officials actually to use their offices for personal gain.

A man who has often violated Executive Order 11222, federal ethics regulations, and the basic standards they embody should not be Attorney General of the United States.

II. SELECTED AREAS OF INQUIRY DESCRIBED IN THE INDEPENDENT COUNSEL'S REPORT

The Independent Counsel investigated 11 sets of allegations against Mr. Meese. (See Appendix I for a list of all the inquiries conducted by the Independent Counsel.) This section reviews facts shown by the Independent Counsel's Report in six areas that especially bear on Mr. Meese's fitness for office.

[1] The words "Independent Counsel" will be used in this Review, as they are in the Report, to refer to the Independent Counsel and his staff. Also, page references for quotations from the Report are set forth in parentheses following the quotations.

1. The relationship, if any, between the loans made to Mr. Meese and the appointment of John McKean to the United States Postal Board of Governors.

Allegations: In the words of the Independent Counsel's Report: "In June and December 1981, John R. McKean made two loans to Mr. Meese totaling $60,000. It has been alleged that there was a connection between the loans and Mr. McKean's nomination, in October 1981, to an unexpired term on the U.S. Postal Board of Governors, as well as his nomination in January 1983, to a full term on that Board."(108)

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: In late June 1981, while serving as Counsellor to the President and as one of our members of the Senior Staff Personnel Committee, the group making final recommendations for Presidential appointments, Mr. Meese received an unsecured loan for $40,000 from John McKean, with interest due "not less than annually." Mr. Meese treated the loan on his Financial Disclosure Statement as one made by Mr. McKean, not knowing the exact sources available to Mr. McKean from which the money came. (Mr. McKean was actually the trustee or middleman for the loan, which came from private investment funds made available to his firm.) Mr. Meese had met with Mr. McKean, who was President of John R. McKean, Accountants, P.C., on the advice of While House Deputy Chief of Staff, Michael Deaver. Mr. Deaver, who was also discussing his personal finances with Mr. McKean and was about to receive his own loan arranged by Mr. McKean as part of a tax shelter Mr. McKean had suggested, was another member of the Senior Staff Committee.

On July 13, 1981, the Senior Staff Committee met to make a recommendation for a vacancy on the Postal Board of Governors. The list of names submitted to the Committee by the White House Office of Presidential Personnel (OPP), the office responsible for initially identifying potential nominees for presidential appointments, did not include the name of John McKean for the vacancy. Although the meeting agenda indicated a "decision" would be made, the decision was deferred, according to the notes of one participant, "until Deaver and Meese come back with a recommendation."

At a subsequent meeting, Mr. Deaver suggested John McKean for the position. According to two persons attending the meeting, after Mr. James Baker III, White House Chief of Staff, indicated he did not know Mr. McKean, Mr. Deaver turned to Mr. Meese and said, "You know him, Ed." Mr. Meese affirmed that he did know Mr. McKean, and that he would be a good person for the job. A tentative, if not final, decision to select Mr. McKean was then made.

The Report states: "None of those present at the Senior Staff meeting recalled any discussion of the fact that Mr. McKean as Mr. Deaver's accountant or Mr. Meese's accountant, nor of knowing that Mr. McKean had just arranged a loan for Mr. Meese or was about to arrange a loan for Mr. Deaver. None recalled Mr. Meese suggesting that he should 'recuse' himself." (124-5)

About one month after Mr. Meese supported Mr. McKean's nomination, they talked by telephone. Mr. McKean recalled telling Mr. Meese that he had learned that his appointment was going through and said words to the effect, "I appreciate any role you've played in this." (127)

A few months later, on December 8, 1981, Mr. Meese called Mr. McKean at his home and asked if he could borrow an additional $20,000, a matter they had discussed earlier. Mr. McKean arranged to have a check for this amount drawn that day on his personal business account, which was later reimbursed by his firm.

In June 1982, Mr. McKean sent Mr. Meese a bill for $3,900 in interest due on the first $40,000 loan through December 1981, to which Mr. Meese did not respond. Mr. McKean did not press him for a time after late July because of the death of Mr. Meese's son.

In September, while the interest was still unpaid, Mr. McKean informed Mr. Meese by a letter (which Mr. Meese did not recall) that he was interested in a full, nine-year term on the Postal Board that would become available in December. In the letter Mr. McKean stated, "With your help I can continue this [work]." (133)

In early November 1982, Mr. McKean sent Mr. Meese copies of bills showing that his accrued interest then totalled $12,000. At a meeting between the two men held on November 8, Mr. McKean agreed to defer Mr. Meese's interest payments until 1983. The agenda for the meeting called for the two men also to discuss at the same time Mr. McKean's desire to serve for a longer term on the Postal Board. The Report states that Mr. Meese did recall one occasion on which Mr. McKean told him that he was interested in a longer term on the Postal Board of Governors, but Mr. Meese did not give the date. Mr. McKean recalled a conversation that he says might have occurred on November 8, in which he asked and Mr. Meese agreed to support him for the longer term.
